In 1932 the Mational Council of Teachers of English rade possible the publication of a study by Sterling Andrews Leonard of the University of Wisconsin, Current English Usage, in which a collection of expressions which have been tabooed by grammarians was submitted to a group of 229 judges consisting of authors, editors, business men. linguists, and teachers for the purpose of being judged as to their acceptability for standard usage. Among the expressions included were two which dealt with the mood of the verb. The first one, If it wasn't for football, school life would be dull, would be considered incorrect by rost granuarians because it uses the indicative where they would consider the subjunctive necessary, but it was accepted by sixty-three per cent of the judges as wood colloquial English. The second expression under consideration, I wish I was wonderful, would call for the subjunctive in the noun clause in order to be approved by most crammarians. but it, too, was accepted by the judges as good English. Furthermore, this second expression was approved by ninetythree per cent. Leonard pointed out in his report that the decision of the judges is evidence that the inflectional subjunctive is gradually disappearing from the English lancuare.

United it is true that there are few inflectional subjunctives left, it is also true that new subjunctives have come along to take their place. The development of these new subjunctives has naturally brought about controversies among scholars and text-book writers.

In an attempt to elerify the matter some scholars have investigated the subjunctive as found in the writings of anthors of merit. They have frequently turned to the sixteenth century writers for their investigations because it was during this period that the inflectional forms of the subjunctive began to be replaced by the periphrastic forms.

of Makespeare, Parlowe, Jonson, and Spencer for his treatise,
An Inquiry Into the Use of the Subjenctive in the Elizabethan Period. Bohumil Traka made a study of the subjunctives in sixteenth century literature in preparing his book, on the System of the inclish Verb from Caxton to Dryden. Although H. Poutsma gathered most of his citations from eighteenth century writings, he turned frequently to the writings of Shakespeare for material.

It is regrettable that no studies of the subjunctive have been based on the writings of Foger Ascham, whose language offers an abundance of excellent material for such an investigation.

The purpose of this study is threefold: 1. to compare some of the treatments of the subjunctive that have been made by writers of school textbooks; 2. to investigate some scholarly treatments of the subjunctive; 3. to offer suggestions for a more systematic treatment, based on the subjunctives in the English writings of Loger Ascham.

ROGER ASCHAM

part of which will be based on the language in the writings of Loger Ascham, it is appropriate to consider his standing as a man of letters. Little has been written about him, but from the few meager biographies available we know that he was recognized as one of the finest writers and philologists of the sixteenth century.

In looking back over his life we find three factors which undoubtedly contributed to Ascham's success: 1) the general conditions in England in the sixteenth century; 2) Ascham's education; 3) Ascham's occupational experiences.

1) The general conditions which existed in England in the sixteenth century offered unlimited stimulation to an eager young scholar. The last great intellectual revolution was filling the mind of every academician with either ardor or anxiety. Following the fall of Constantinople England had become a place of refuge for the Greeks, who naturally took along with them their language and culture. The art of printing had made books available for those who desired them. The doctrines of Luther were causing much controversy throughout the churcles and colleges.

We have evidence that the intellectual revolution left its mark on Ascham from such reports as:

Roger Ascham was not only a typical literary Englishman, but a notable representative of the New Learning as it took root in England, 1

Ascham became an enthusiastic student of the Greek language and philosophy and passed his enthusiasm on to the small boys in the town and to his classmates at college. We read that "he taught Greek, he wrote Greek, he talked Greek, no wonder if he dreamed in Greek." On one occasion he wrote a letter to his friend, Fobert Pember, in such excellent Greek that Pember replied, "Dearly beloved, — I render those thanks for thy Greek espistle, which might seem to have been indited at ancient Athens, so exactly hast thou attained the propriety of Greek phrase." He testifies to the increased popularity of Greek at the college when he writes in 1542 to Frandesby:

Aristotle and rlato are now read by the boys in the original language. Sophocles and Euriphides are now more familiar to us then Flautus was when you were here. Herodotus, Thucydides, and Kenophon are more read now than Livy was then. They talk now as much of Demosthenes, as they did of Cicero at that time.

In a letter to Sir W. Paget he refers to his appointment, at a "handsome salary" to "profess the Greek tongue in public." Ascham even entered into a controversy at one time concerning the correct pronunciation of the Greek language. He took great delight in teaching Greek to the Princess Elizabeth and makes reference in later years to Queen Elizabeth's proficiency in Greek.

The doctrines of Luther left their imprint on young Ascham, too, for at an early age he accepted the Protestant faith.

2) Ascham's education began when he was placed under the capable tutelage of R. Bond, who inspired in him a love for books from the very start. At a time when scarcely anyone in England was reading English the young boy showed a preference for books that were written in English.

His formal education began when at fifteen he entered St.

John's College in Cambridge. This was a fortunate choice for two reasons; it was the most famous seminary in England at the time, and Ascham was placed under the guidance of two men who were to become outstanding teachers in later years. One was

John Cheke, who afterwards became the tutor of Edward VI, and the other was John Redman, who was destimed to be the first master of Trinity College.

John Cheke must have made a lasting impression on his pupil, for Ascham refers to him often in his writings years later. In a discussion of the value of Imitation in The Scholemaster, he wrote, "This matter maketh me gladly remember my sweete tyme spent at Cambridge, and the pleasant talke which I had oft with M. Cheke and M. Watson, ---*6 Later he refers to him again in these words: "My dearest frend, and best master that ever I had or heard in learning, Syr I. Cheke, soch a man, as if I should live to see England breed the like again, I feare, I should live over long."

Ascham received his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1531 and his degree of Master of Arts in 1537. However, his education was not limited to that which he gained from institutions of learning. His travels through Germany and Italy added to his linguistic and humanistic education and left their mark on his literary career.

3) Throughout his life Ascham engaged in remunerative work which contributed to his success as a writer. During his student days he spent much time tutoring the small boys in Greek. One of his masters made the remark that he would learn more by explaining one fable to a student than he would by listening to the lengthy explanation of a difficult passage made by someone else. No doubt his reputation as a philologist owes something to the training he received through this tutoring.

Following his graduati on in 1537 he was appointed Mathematical Lecturer at the University. Nine years later, in 1846, he secured the position of Public Orator, in which capacity he had to write all of the public letters for the University. His experience as writing-master to Prince Eduard, the Princess Elizabeth, and others helped to fit him for this post. Furthermore, his experience in the capacity of Public Orator helped fit him for his literary career.

The fact that he was chosen to teach members of the Poyel family is an indication that his ability was held in high esteem. His years of service in this capacity must have contributed to his mestery of the language. Later his appointment as Secretary to Queen Fary offered him still more opportunity to perfect his style of writing.

In addition to the outside factors which contributed to Ascham's success, we must add one more factor - Ascham's own desire to perfect his English. He wrote the Toxophilus in English when, he explains in his Freface, it would have been "more profitable for his study and more honest for his name" to have written it in another language. He says that the language which is used by the best of the country should not be vile for him to write. He further writes:

And as for the Latin or greke tonge, everye thyng is so excellently done in them, that none can do better: In the Englysh tonge contrary, every thinge in a maner so meanly, bothe for the matter and handelynge, that no men can do worse. For therin the least learned for the moste parte, have ben alwayes most redye to wryte. And they whiche had leaste hope in latin, have bene moste boulde in englyshe: when surelye every man that is moste ready to taulke, is not most able to wryte. He that wyll wryte well in any tongue, muste followe thys councel of Aristotle, to speake as the common people do, to thinke as wise men do: and so shoulde every man vnderstande hym, and the judgement of wyse men alowe hym.

In the Retrospective Review for 1821 we find the suggestion that perhaps we owe more to Ascham for having set a successful example of a simple and pure taste in writing than for having cultivated the Greek language among us. Concerning his style we read:

Ascham is a great name in our national literature. He was one of the first founders of a true English style in prose composition, and one of the most respectable and useful of our scholars. He was amongst the first to reject the use of foreign wordsand idioms—a fashion, which in the reign of Henry VIII, began to be so prevalent that the authors of that day, by "usinge straunge wordes, as Latine, Frenche, and Italian, did make all thinges darke and harde."

Ascham's interest in clarity of expression and simplicity of style is revealed in The Scholemaster.

For what proprietie in wordes, simplicitie in sentences, plainnesse and light, is comelie for these kindes, locaesar and Livie---are perfite examples of limitation.

He speaks of Plato, Isocrates, and others as "the purest and playnest writers, that ever wrote in any tong, and best examples for any man to follow whether he write, Latin, Italian, French, or English."

He refers repeatedly to the importance of acquiring perfection in writing. In recommending the use of models in the study of language he mentions their helpfulness to the study of English.

And this is not onelie to serue in the Latin or Greke tong, but also in our English language --- must we seeke in the Authors onelie of those two tonges, the trewe Paterne of Eloquence, if in any other mother tongue we looke to attaine, either to perfit utterance of it ourselves, or skilfull judgement of it in others.

His interest in words is revealed in such phrases as: "his [Varro's] wordes sometyme be somewhat rude"13 "In deed, our English tong, having in use chiefly wordes of one syllable which commonly be long, ---, "14 He speaks of Salust's "use of old words and new ones 14 and his "hard composition and crooked framing of his wordes and sentences, as a man would say, English talke placed and framed outlandish like, "15

Ascham's published writings include one hundred sixty-five letters written during the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI; and Queen Mary, and seventy letters written during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, a few poems in Latin, and his three English works, The Toxophilus, A Report of the Affaires and State of Germany, and The Scholemaster. His correspondence includes letters to the rulers of Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Poland and Dohemia, to Sueen Elizabeth, to the Pope, to Eishops, senators, dukes, and to former teachers, schoolmates, and pupils. As these letters are nearly all in Latin, they will be of no value in this study; therefore we shall turn directly to the three English writings which will form the basis for the study.

during his residence at the University of Cambridge, was the only one of the three which was published during his lifetime. It was first published in 1845 by Edward Whitehurch. A second edition was published by Thomas Marshe in 1871 and a third by Abell Leffes in 1889. The leport of the affaires and State of Germany was written in 1883, but it was not printed until after Aschan's death, probably about 1870. The Scholemaster was published by John Paye in 1877.

I have chosen those three English works as the basis for an investigation of the subjenctive mood because they were written during the period when the inflectional subjunctive was beginning to be replaced by the periphrastic subjunctive, because Ascham was considered a master of the English language, and because no studies of the subjunctive have been based on his writings.

THE PROBLEM OF THE SUPJUNCTIVE

Textbook Trentment

The subjunctive mood is always a controversial subject among the writers of textbooks. Some devote several pages to a discussion of it; others give it only passing consideration; while a few orit all mention of the subjunctive in their textbooks.

Charles Henshaw Ward in his book, What Is English?. which he wrote in 1925 and sub-titled "A Fook of Stratery for English Teachers", gives the following advice to teachers of English concerning the teaching of the subjunctive: "Unless my principal or some state examining toard oblined me to teach mood, I should never take up the subject in school. A statement or question of fact is indicative, and a command is imperative; those two moods English really has. And there are romants of an undoubted subjunctive mood in a few formal or archaic uses like 'if it were', 'may it be', 'though he have'. Mese are real variations in form to show that the verbs express a mere mode of thought. Reyond this there is only a welter of subtleties, a flux of contradictory opinion. If left to your own devices, have nothing to do with anything but the few realities. If you are required to teach subjunctives, stick to one simple formula: Does it clearly indicate a more condition of thought? Many cases are debatable. There are fewer subjunctives than you suppose. Probably the following are indicative: 'I could have shot it with perfect ease' (the fact is that I have power to). "I may be wrong about this" (the fact is that there is such a possibility), 'Perhaps you would like to stay! (the fact perhaps really is that). The following would usually be called subjunctive, because they clearly show, or the context shows, that the verb is not indicating a fact: 'If only I could have shot it.' I might have gone to bed sooner. 'Wouldn't he have enjoyed that?' Few will ever object to your method if you limit subjunctives to: (1) real subjunctive by its form, (2) more prayerful hope or exhortation that does not sound the least like fact. (3) a condition that is clearly a case of speaking about what would be true if the facts were otherwise. I cannot conceive thy any teacher should ever need to mention optative or potential moods, for these are mere shades of meaning; they are not changes of form; they are phantoms imported from classical grammar. "1

E. A. Cross makes no mention of the subjunctive in his textbook, The Little Grapmar, which has been widely used in secondary schools throughout the country since its publication in 1922.

The Feed and Kellog grammar, which has been a stand-by ever since its publication in 1809, goes no further than a brief definition of the subjunctive and potential modes.

"The Subjunctive mode asserts the action or being as a mere condition, supposition or wish. The Potential mode asserts the power, liberty, possibility, or necessity of being or action."2

Madel C. Hermans, besearch assistant in English at Los Angeles, California, includes instruction in the subjunctive in her text, Studies in Grammer, published in 1924. She defines the subjunctive as follows: "A verb is in the subjunctive mood when it is used in expressing a wish, a condition contrary to fact, or something that is uncertain." She then gives a conjugation of the verb "be" in the present and past subjunctive in the following form: "If I be there", "If you be there," etc. The immature student, learning the conjugation from her chart supposes, and with good reason, that the verb is in the subjunctive mood only when it is preceded by the word if.

Yet the exercises which follow contain such sentences as:
"I wish she were here now " in which the word if does not appear at all.

<sup>2.</sup> Reed, Alonso and Kellog, Brainerd, Higher Lessons in English, 318.

A Handbook of Grammar by Sidwell and Siegfried, published in 1988, lists five uses of the subjunctive:

1. Use the subjunctive to express an uncertain condition.
2. Use the subjunctive in a condition contrary to fact.
3. In wishes introduced by such words as would, may, etc., the subjunctive is sometimes used.
4. If a concession is contrary to fact, the past subjunctive is used to refer to present time and the past perfect to past time just as in conditions contrary to fact.
5. The subjunctive is used after such expressions as, as if, as though, had as lief, had rather, and had better.

The only mention of the subjunctive in the college textbook, Composition for College Students, published in 1927 by Thomas, Manchester, and Scott, is the following definition: "The form which expresses a wish in the independent sentences (God grant this be true) and is used considerably in dependent clauses; e.g., in wishes, and in certain conditional and concessive clauses, expressing uncertain condition or condition contrary to fact. Ex. If this were your first offense, the case would be different. If this be treason, make the most of it. "5"

In A Frief English Grammar, by Fred Scott and Gertrude Duck, 1905, appears this definition: "Verbs which represent a state of things not as actually existing nor yet as imperatively demanded by the speaker, but merely as capable of existing, are said to be in the subjunctive mood. Under this head come verbs which represent a state of things as merely supposed, as possible under certain circumstances, or as wished for without the strong demand of the imperative mood." He lists other uses of the subjunctive as: "in making such wishes as 'God be with you, 'Long live the King!' Sweet be thy sleep. . in subordinate clauses indicating a state of uncertainty, apprehension, deliberation, desire. " In regard to periphrastic forms he writes: "The subjunctive forms of the verb are not, as we have previously noted, frequently employed in modern English. Instead of them we often use, to express a state of things which is possible or desired rather than actually present, certain so-called auxiliary or helping words in combination with the principal verbs of the sentence or clause .--- Such auxiliary verbs as could, should, would, may, might, are thus used in combination with principle verbs of the sentence or clause in the place of the subjunctive forms."7

In 1927 George Erapp, in A Comprehensive Guide to Good English, which is a discussion of current American idiom, makes the following statements about the subjunctive in present day English:

The subjunctive mood in present day English is restricted almost entirely to the condition contrary to fact, as in If he were commander-in-chief, there is no question what he would do. In literary style a concession or supposition is sometimes expressed by the subjunctive, as in Were I to do that, I should never regain my self-respect: If I were to do that, etc., but the more usual form for expressing this idea would be, If I did that, I should never regain my self-respect. In literary style sometimes a high degree of doubt is expressed by the subjunctive, as in If climate be an important element in the formation of national character, the character ceases to be entirely a subjective creation. In colloquial speech, even in the condition contrary to fact, the forms of the subjunctive appear frequently only when the subject of the verb is a personal pronoun. I, you, he, she, we, they. But in these constructions also, colloquial speech ordinarily has the indicative, as If he was here, he would tell us what to do; Tottering as if he was about to fall; I wish I was in your place. These uses are now so general that they must be accepted as at least good colloquial English. The subjunctive is employed most frequently when it is employed at all, in forms of the verb to be. With other verbs, the subjunctive has a distinctly literary, often artificial color, as in If he believe honestly, a believer will readily make converts. But the more natural phrasing would be If he believes honestly, etc. 18

Charles Fries, Professor of English at the University of Michigan, made a survey of American English, basing it on an examination of letters written by American soldiers during the World War of 1914-1918. Among other conclusions which he made as a result of this survey are the following concerning the use of the subjunctive.

1. In general the subjunctive has tended to disappear from use. This statement does not mean that the ideas formerly expressed by the inflectionally distinct forms of the verb called the subjunctive are not now expressed but rather that these ideas are now expressed chiefly by other means, especially by function words.

2. In these materials taken all together not more than one fifth of the instances of that clauses after such words as ask, request, command, suggest, order, etc. used the subjunctive, and only 22.6 per cent of the "non-fact conditions" used the subjunctive.

3. The failure to use the subjunctive form in non-fact conditions, and in that clauses after words of asking, requesting, suggesting, etc., is not characteristic of Vulgar English only. The practices of Standard English and Vulgar English do not differ significantly in this respect.

Scholarly Treatment

A discussion of the subjunctive from the scholar's viewpoint may well begin with a statement made by Foah Vebster, who might be considered America's first grammarian, because in 1784 he wrote a treatise entitled A Plain and Comprehensive Grammar. 10 In 1789 he expressed the following opinion concerning the subjunctive: "by the construction of our language, no subjunctive mode is necessary - in most cases it is improper - and what is the strongest of all arguments, it is not used in the spoken language, which is the only true form of grammar. "11

Sixty-two years later Coold Brown wrote in his Grammar of English Grammars: "The Subjunctive mood is that form of the verb which represents the being, action, or passion, as conditional, doubtful, and contingent: as, 'If thou go, see that thou offend not' 'See thou do it not' Rev.xix, 10."12 He further writes: "The subjunctive mood is so called because it is always subjoined to an other verb. It usually denotes some doubtful contingency, or some supposition contrary to fact. The manner of its dependence is commonly denoted by one of the following conjunctions: if, that, though, lest, unless. 12 He oriticises grammarians Chandler, Frasee, Pisk, S. S. Greene, Comly, Ingersoll, R. C. Smith, Sanborn, Mack, Butler, Hart, Weld, Pinneo, and others for recognizing a "subjunctive mood in the indicative form", adding that "the suggestion which we frequently meet with, that the regular indicative or potential mood may be thrown into the mibjunctive by merely prefixing a conjunction, is something worse than nonsense. Indeed, no mood can ever be made a part of an other, without the grossest confusion and absurdity. Yet, strange as it is, some celebrated authors, misled by an if, have tangled together toree of them, producing such a sharl of tenses as never yet our have been understood without being ridiculous. *13 On the following page he states: "The true subjunctive mood, in English, is virtually rejected by some later grammarians who nevertheless acknowledge under that name a greater number and variety of forms than have ever been claimed for it in any other tongue. All that is peculiar to the Subjunctive, all that should constitute it a distinct mood, they represent as an archaism, an obsolete or antiquated mode of expression, while they willingly give to it every form of both the indicative and the potential, the two other moods which sometimes follow an if. #14

The views of these two grammarians show the disagreement that exists in regards to the subjunctive even among scholars. Some agree with Brown that the subjunctive should be left in its classic form; others are of Sebster's opinion that it should be eliminated entirely; still others take a "middle-of-the-road" attitude.

In 1874 William Kasten submitted to the University of hostock for his dissertation leading to the degree of doctor of philosophy a study of the subjunctives as he found them in the works of thakespears, Johnson, Marlows, and Spencer.

In his study, which he approaches from a grammatical angle, he first lists the uses of the subjunctive in principal sentences, subdividing them into five groups of present subjunctives and four groups of imperfect subjunctives. The subjunctives of dependent clauses he subdivides into substantive sontences, adverbial sentences, and relative sentences. Felow are his categories, together with examples which he has taken from the above-mentioned authors.

PRINCIPAL SMUTERICES

1. to express an action or state as merely supposed, whether realized or not:

Euch men as he be never at heart's ease. (Sh. J. C.)

How chance the roses there do fade so fast. (Sh. N. E. D.)

2. in wishes, prayers, and corrands:

Sis be the praise. (Spencer: Fairy Queen, 0.135)

"Thy love ne'er alter till they sweet life end." (Sh. H. N. D.)

"God save such a lord." (Chaucer: Knight's Tale.)

- 3. in a supposition upon which another statement depends:
  - "No it so she will not consent --- . I beg the ancient privilege of Athens." (th. N. D. 1.1.)
- 4. in a concession:

"Rone can hear him, cry he ne'er so loud." (Marl. Jew.)

"be thou a spirit of hell, Bring with thee --- "

5. in a principal clause partaking of the nature of a conditional clause:

"If I do, mankind disclaim me ever." (Ben Jonson.)

Following these citations, he lists examples of the imperfect subjunctive under similar headings.

1. incortainty - (also politoness):

"What board were I bost to play it in?" (Sh. M. N. D.)
"It were bost he speak no harm of Frutus here." (Sh. J.C.)
"That were enough to hang us all." (Sh. M. N. D.)

- 2. in wishes implying possibility:
  - "I am the best of them that speak this language, were I but where 'tis spoken."
- 3. in statements contrary to fact (inverted word order):
  - "O were favor so, yours would I catch." (Sh. M. N. D.)
- 4. uncertainty from the conditional clause:

"If the matter were good, I durst swear it were his."

There are several apparent inconsistencies in the above classification. In his first example it is possible that the verb, be, is indicative, since the subject is plural. In his example under  $\underline{\delta}$  of his first group, he attributes the subjunctive disclaim to its proximity to a subjunctive in the conditional clause. Would not the sentence, Mankind disclaim me ever., call for the subjunctive in its own right as an example of his second classification, i.e. in wishes, prayers, and commands? Is not that statement parallel to one of the examples he has used, "Thy love ne'er falter till thy sweet life end?". Furthermore, can concessive clauses be classified as principal sentencest In the citation, "None can hear him, ery he nefer so loud , the subjunctive, ery, is in a clause which depends upon the principal clause. "None can hear him." Again, in the examples from the imperfect subjunctive he has included a citation from a dependent clause under his group of subjunctives in principal sentences, i.e., (3) in statements contrary to fact (inverted word order): "O were favor so, yours would I satch." In my opinion, 0 were favor so is a dependent clause in inverted word-order. It is only another way of saying, "O if favor were so, yours would I catch." Under the fourth heading, uncertainty from the conditional clause, he has given the following citation: "If the matter were good, I durst ewear it were his." By classifying it thusly, he is claiming that the verb were is in a principal sentence and is subjunctive because of its proximity to the conditional. If the matter were good. First of all, the verb were is not found in a principal sentence, but rather in a noun clause used as a direct object. Second, it is subjunctive because it is expressing an uncertainty following the worb durst swear.

While his examples of the subjunctive in principal sentences are confined to formal subjunctives, it will be seen from the following citations taken from his discussion of the subjunctive in subordinate clauses that he has included periphrastic subjunctives as well as formal ones.

A. Substantive sentences

- "I told him, he were best to send it." (Marl. Jew., 4.5.)
- "They should swear hell were broken loose." (Ben J. Ev. M. 4.1.)
- "Do you think I would leave you." (Ben J. Ev. M. 1.3.)
- "I hope he be in love." (Sh. Kuch Ado. 3.2.)
- "I fear'd lest I might anger thee." (Sh. Temp. 4.1.)
- "Fray heaven it do." (Ben J. Ev. M. 2.3.)
- "But I beseech your grace that I may know the worst."
  (She M. N. D. 1.1.)
- "I'd rather it were a spaniard." (Ben.J. Ev. E. 2.7.)
- "It was natural that he should unconsciously magnify their merits." (Prescott.)

B. Adverbial sentences

- Temperal sentences:
  "If our father would sleep till I waked him." (Sh. K. L.)
  - "Long ere it were day." (Chaucer, N. P. T. 131)
  - "The canker galls the infants of the spring too oft before their buttons be disclosed." (Sh. Ham. 1.)
  - "Ere he do leave this grove, thou shalt fly him." (Sh. M. N. D. 2.2.)
- Conditional sentences:
  - "If the proverb hold, that cannot be. (Een J. Ev. H.)
  - "Bumor is nothing if it be not fed." (Ben J. Ev. E.)
  - "Or, if there were a sympathy in choice, war did lay seige to it." (Sh. M. N. D. 1.1.)

Concessive sentences:

"Though she be but little, she is fierce." (Sh. M. N. D.)

"However the world go I make sure for one."
(Marl. Jew. 1.1.)

Consecutive and intentional sentences:

"You would fright the ladies that they would shriek."

(Sh. M. N. D. 1.2.)

"Seek for him lest his ungovern'd rage dissolve his life." (Sh. K. L.)

Sentences of modality:

("Subordinate sentences expressing the manner in which something is done, in some cases, admits of the subjunctive mood.")

"Yet even in beginners (It were best) to adhere so moderately, as he be a man of the one faction which is passablest with the other."

"Smile upon my speeches as if I were a fool." (Sh. Hml.)

C. Relative sentences:

Determinative.

"With power to excite all who in future time may appear." (Webster)

Expletive.

"I hither come engaged by my oath (which God defend a knight should violate." (Sh. R. II.)16

Under substantive sentences he lists: "I fear'd lest I might anger thee." His explanation for including it in this group is that the word lest is sometimes substituted for the word that in noun clauses. However, it would be feasible to include this citation under condition of exception. It seems that he has adopted the term sentences of modality to cover that use of the subjunctive which expresses the manner of doing something. Is not this nomenclature apt to be confused with modal verbs? In discussing subjunctive in principal sentences he groups all periphrastic expressions under the heading: Verbs of modality; in discussing subjunctive in subordinate clauses he includes the periphrastics with the formal subjunctives and then uses the term modality in quite a different significance. Kasten closes his discussion with the following statement: "In the English of our days the differences between the indicative and subjunctive moods have almost entirely vanished in common prose; the subjunctive is seldom used in conversation except by pedants, however, in elevated language and poetry it is still found according to the rules prevailing in the Elizabethan period." 17

Henry Eweet, in his New English Grammar, written in 1893, list two uses for the subjunctive in independent clauses:

1. to express wishes and commands; 2. to express fear of the future. He subdivides the subjunctive of dependent clauses in the following manner: 1. rejected condition; 2. hypothetical comparison implying rejection; 3. rejected fulfillment after a worb of wishing. His notion of the subjunctive is confined to inflectional forms, all periphrastic substitutes being classified under three additional moods: 1. conditional; 2. compulsive; 3. permissive.

author of a five-volume study, "A Hodern Knelish Grammar, along with other dissertations, draws a definite line between formal subjunctives and their substitutes, referring to the latter as "imaginative use of tenses". According to him the subjunctive has been needlessly complicated by those writers who speak of combinations with auxiliary verbs as if they were subjunctive or subjunctive equivalents. In Essentials of English Grammar he writes: "The subjunctive is used in main sontences to express a (realizable) wish, chiefly in set phrases like:

"God bless you! God save the King!"
"Reaven preserve us!"
"The Lord have mercy on us!"
"Long live the King!"
"Money be hanged!"

Other related uses of the subjunctive are seen in:

"Far be it from me to depreciate such pleasures."
"Home is home, be it ever so homely."
"Suffice it to say that---"
"Enow all men by these presents---" (in juridical parlance)

He is of the opinion that the subjunctive in expressions of uncertainty, hesitation, and diffidence no longer has the force it did at one time and may be considered a "literary trick to remove the style from everyday associations." 18

Under "imaginative use of tenses" he asserts that in ninety-nine per cent of the cases in which the preterit of imagination is used, it is impossible to tell from the form whether it is indicative or subjunctive. Is he not admitting that the forms which he labels as "preterit of imagination" might be true subjunctives? A few citations will suffice to show that his "imaginative tenses" are parallel to subjunctives of Kasten.

Jespersen's "imaginative tense" Kasten's subjunctive

- 1. Would I could doubt it!
- 1. Would I could assure you.
- 2. I wish I had a cause---.
- 2. I wish you could advance ----
- 3. If one had but two heads---.
- 3. If you were civil---.
- 4. You might do me a favor [if you would.]
- 4. He could easily do it [if he tried.]

In his Philosophy of Grammar Jespersen suggests a possibility of eighteen moods of the verb which he terms: "notional moods": jussive, compulsive, obligative, advisory, precative, hortative, permissive, promissive, optative, desiderative, intentional, assertive, presumptive, dubitative, potential, conditional, hypothetical, and concessional. All of these suggested moods are subjunctive in nature, and many of them could be combined, thus reducing the number of categories. In my opinion the distinction between compulsive and obligative is too slight to warrant a double category. Likewise the terms advisory, precative, and hortative are synonymous. Since he did not give examples of these various categories, we cannot be certain of his exact meaning in some cases, but it is probable that some of the remaining terms could be combined to reduce the number.

George Curme, who has given us a most usable textbook in College English Grammar, published in 1925,20 maintains that any expression which is subjunctive in nature may be classified as subjunctive whether it is a verb with the subjunctive ending or a substitute for that inflectional form. His classification begins from the stand-point of usage, 1.e., he lists volative subjunctive, subjunctive of wish, subjunctive of logical reasoning, etc. When he comes to the potential subjunctive in dependent clauses, he forgets that he was classifying from the stand-point of usage and turns to a grammatical classification:
1.e. 1. noun clauses, 2. attributive relative clauses. At this point he returns to his classification according to usage,
3. conditional sentences, 4. clauses of result, 5. clauses of cause, 21

Below is Curme's classification together with examples which he includes under each category.

OPTATIVE SUBJUNCTIVE

l. volative:

Let him come in;
We must go;
You shall do as I say;
You may go into the woods.
Would you tell me the time?
You might offer to help me.

2. subjunctive of wish:
God bless you!
May you see many happy returns.
Oh were he only here!
Might I see her just once!

- 3. subjunctive of logical reasoning: Let figure a b c be an isosceles triangle.
- 4. action conceded:

Say what he will, he cannot make matters worse. Let him say what he will, he cannot make---.
Though he make every effort, he cannot succeed. However hard it rains (it may rain) we shall have to go.

Even though he were here, I would say the same.

- 5. action desired:
  - a. in noun clauses:

She desires that he do (may do) it.
She begs that he will do it.
It is my wish that he come. (may come, shall come)
I wish I were dead.

I wish you would stay.

b. in relative clauses:

I desire only such books as shall instruct. Envoys were sent who should sue for peace. I am hunting a man who may take my place.

c. in adverbial clauses:

I'll go early that I may get a good seat.
He is so badly hurt that he shall (should) be taken to the hospital.
Your father is going to wait till your uncle shall come. 22

POTENTIAL SUBJUNCTIVE

In principal clauses:

It may rain.
It cannot be true.
He could easily do it.
It might possibly be true.
It were wise to be silent.
He must have come by now.

In subordinate clauses:

1. noun clauses:

It seems quite probable that it may rain. We doubt whether it be possible. I fear that he may not recover. I don't know what I should do. Each was dreading lest the other suspect it.

<sup>22.</sup> Curme, College English Granmar, 260-266.

2. attributive relative clauses:

It is a book that may help.

I offer a reward to anyone who shall give me the address.

3. conditional sentences:

bractical condition: Let him go, so only he come home with glory. If God so clothe the grass----The slight, if there be one, was unintentional.

theoretical condition:

If it should rain, I wouldn't go.

If we missed (should miss, were to miss) the train, --- condition contrary to fact:

If we were here, I would speak.
If it had rained, I would not have gone.

elliptical condition:
To could easily do it if he tried.
I should say if I were asked that it were better to say nothing.

4. clauses of result:

He is so badly injured that he must die. He is so badly injured that he may die. he is so badly injured that he might die.

5. clauses of cause:

Let us not shrink for fear (or lest) our motives to misunderstood.

She was afraid to breathe legt she break (or should break) the magic spell.

Curme could have reduced his list of uses of the optative subjunctive by combining his second category, subjunctive of wish, with his fourth category, action desired. While the former deals with subjunctive in independent clauses and the latter with subjunctive in dependent clauses, he has made no such distinction in the headings, and therefore has no need for the two headings.

In 1930 the Frague Linguistic Circle published a study by a Czech scholar, Bohumil Trnka entitled: On the Syntax of the English Verb from Caxton to Dryden. In this study Trnka subdivides the subjunctive, (which he prefers to call the optative), into two moods: 1. wishing mood; 2. thought mood. Under wishing mood he gives such examples as: Blessyd maye he be! May it please you to let it passe. Long mayst thou live. Of that the slave had 40,000 lives 24 Under thought mood he gives: How schal we defend the lyberty? When should I lose that handkerchief? In his classification the subjunctive of subordinate clauses falls under the following categories: 1. that-clauses: 2. deliberative indirect questions; 3, temporal clauses; 4, concessive clauses; 5, consecutive clauses; 6. final clauses; 7. relative clauses; 8. conditional clauses; 9. comparative clauses, 25 It is evident from the above classification that Trnka, too, has vacillated between a classification from a standpoint of usage and one from a standpoint of grammatical structure.

H. Poutsma devotes 84 pages of his Mood and Tense of the English Verb to a discussion of the subjunctive and conditional moods. His treatment is cumbersome and confusing. In the Introduction he outlines the order in which he intends to discuss the subjunctive and conditional moods. I repeat the outline, omitting the explanations and citations.

- a) principal sentences
  - 1. optative sentences
  - 2. hortative sentences
  - 3. consequent sentences
- b) subordinate clauses
  - 1. subordinate statements
  - 2. subordinate questions
  - 3. adverbial clauses

It is apparent from this outline that he, too, confused two types of classification in his scheme. He is classifying the subjenctives in principal sentences according to use; he is classifying the subjunctives of subordinate clauses according to grammatical structure.

26

Only by careful examination is it possible to detect his general outline in the study, so risleading is his system of numbering.

scope and not at all in proportion to his detailed study.

They consist of three statements (with a number of citations under each).

- 1) It should be remembered that he as a finite verb is used not only as a subjunctive, but also as an indicative.
- 2) Shakespeare has a good many instances of be instead of is after to think and one after to hope, but, as he is anything but strict in the use of the subjunctive and indicative, we have no certainty that in these places we have to deal with an intentional subjunctive.
- 5) The use of the inflectional or periphrastical subjunctive or conditional in a given sentence or clause may entail the use of the same mood in clauses depending on them, which would otherwise have the indicative. 27

Throughout his investigation Poutsma has recognized both the inflectional forms and the periphrastic forms and has given ample citations for each.

A few general conclusions may be drawn from the examination of the notions of the subjunctive mood according to Kasten, Sweet, Jespersen, Curme, Trnim, and Poutsma. 1. There is a general tendency to ignore the distinction botween usage and grammatical structure in much the manner of the school boy who wrote in his essay, "Mankind is divided into men, children, fathers, women, bachelors, unclos, and girls. * 2. The notion of uncertainty has been classified under many moods, including subjunctive, optative, compulsive, conditional, permissive, obligative, and imperative. (Not mentioning the ciriteen moods which were suggested by Jespersen.) 3. Opinion is divided as to whether only those verbs should be considered subjunctive which have the inflectional form of the subjunctive or whether the periphrastic substitutes for the inflectional forms, i.e. should, would, might, may, etc. should be included under the category of subjunctive.

Suggested Freetment

The New English Dictionary defines subjunctive as "Pesignating a mood the forms of which are employed to denote an action or a state as conceived (and not as a fact) and therefore used to express a wish, command, exhert tion, or a contingent, hypothetical, or prospective event." 23

The Houvenu Petit Larousse Illustré defines the subjunctive as the "Mode du verbe, indiquant qu'une action est conque comme subordonnée à une autre et, par conséquent, comme douteuse." 29

Trepresents sorething as not actually belonging to the domain of fact or reality, but as merely existent in the mind of the speaker as a desire, wish, volition, plan, conception, thought; soretimes with more or less hope of realization, or, in the case of a statement, with more or less belief; soretimes with little or no hope or faits."

If we consider the subjunctive in the light of these definitions, a classification must include not only those verb forms which have a so-called "subjunctive ending" but any expressions used to denote uncertainty of action in all its variations.

One definitions given in Part I of this chapter are evidence that the writers of terthooks did not all arree as to what should be included under the term "subjunctive". The scholars whose notions are discussed in Part II disagreed on this point as much as did the textbook writers. Goold Brown and Otto Jespersen both maintained that only those verbs might be considered subjunctive which had the inflectional ending of the subjunctive mood. George Curve and H. Poutsma are of the opinion that the term subjunctive applies not only to verbs with the inflectional ending of the subjunctive, but also to all expressions which serve the same purpose. Folumil Traka and William Easten take a middle of the road attitude, recognizing the inflectional forms and the periphrastic forms, referring in some instances to the periphrastics as "subjunctives" and in other instances as "substitutes for the subjunctives" and in other instances as "substitutes for the subjunctive."

Pefore making a classification of the subjunctive, we must decide upon what basis we intend to make the classification. It is possible to classify from the standpoint of grammatical structure. Such a classification would fit into a general outline similar to the following.

- I. subjunctive in independent clauses
- II. subjunctive in dependent clauses
  - A. in noun clauses
  - B. in adjective clauses
  - C. in adverb clauses

It is also possible to classify from the standpoint of usage.

(This is sometimes called a "notional classification".)

I have already pointed out in Part II that many of the scholars have shifted their classification from grammatical to notional, and the result has been a classification which lacks clarity.

It seems to me that since a classification of the subjunctive involves a cateloguing of expressions which deal with various phases of uncertainty, the more logical approach is the one from the standpoint of use. I have therefore built my scheme on that basis.

and an examination of the citations which they incorporated in their studies, I have evolved a scheme into which those citations will fit. The scheme consists of seven types of subjunctive, five of which are broad enough in scope to warrant sub-divisions. The seven types are: obligation, percission, emotion, condition, concession, supposition, and limitation.

The subjunctive of obligation expresses

- (1) moral obligation:

  It is necessary that he pray to God for help.

  The Lord demanded that the stricken workn have faith in Him.

  We must follow the dictates of our conscience.
- (2) legal obligation:
  The law requires that he pay a fine.
  The King ordered that every subject be questioned.
- (3) logical of lightion:
  It is essential that he have fifty dollars for traveling expenses.
  We must work hard if we want to succeed.

The subjunctive of permission needs no subdivision.

Let him spend the money as he wishes. He may spend the money as he wishes.

The subjunctive of emotion expresses

- (1) desire:

  Would that I could go to England now!

  I wish I were in England now.

  I wish they would take me to England with them.

  I wish that I might spend the summer in England.
- (2) prayer:

  We shall pray that his health be restored to him.

  He prayed that his child might be saved.

  Let us pray that the war may end soon.
- (3) hope:

  He hopes he will be elected.

  He hoped he might be elected.

  It was their hope that he would be the next governor.
- (4) fear:
  The mother is afraid that the bear may bite her child.
  She feared that he might be ferocious.
- (5) regret or grief:

  It is a pity that he be so stupid.

  1 regret that he should be so stupid.

The subjunctive of condition expresses:

- (1) condition of present reality:

  If he lack courage, he cannot undertake it.
- (2) condition of potential reality:

  If they would follow instructions, they could build it in a few hours.
- (3) condition of unreality:

  If I were you, I would call a doctor.

  If I had lived five hundred years ago, I would have missed knowing you.

The subjunctive of concession needs no subdivision. It includes such expressions as: Though he huff and he puff, he can never blow it down. Although it should take another week, he must finish the book.

The subjunctive of supposition expresses

- (1) possibility:

  It is possible that she will arrive today.

  It is possible that she ray arrive today.

  It is possible that she right arrive today.

  She may arrive today.

  She right arrive today.
- (2) indecision:
  They were undecided whether he were guilty or not.
  They wondered if he were guilty.
  They did not know if he would be accuitted.
- (5) belief or hear-say:
  I believe he will write to them.
  I hear that he will write to them.
  I understand that he may write to them.
  I heard that he would write to them.
  It is runored that the invasion may start today.

The subjunctive of limitation expresses

- (1) limitation of a person, object, or idea:

  The is looking for a sleeping powder that do not harm the patient.

  They wanted a chauffeur who would fulfill all of the qualifications.

  He was working on an invention that wight revolutionize the industry.
- (2) limitation of cause, reason, or purpose:

  She invited him weeks ahead lest be be unable to come.

  That you may attend the meeting 1 am disrissing
  you early.
- (3) limitation of time and distance:

  The child has been asked to wait until his father come.

  The boy will walk out on the ledge as far as he gare.
- (4) limitation of action:

  No would somer have failed the examination than he would have passed it dishonestly.

  Pe spaded the carden as he night dig a grave.

  Pe read as though he were accustored to reading aloud.

- (5) limitation of quality:

  The dinner was as delicious as though it were prepared by an experienced chef.

  He is so clever with his hands that he wight be a magician.
- (6) limitation of namer or decree:

  He ran as quickly as he would if he were a marathon runner.

I have omitted any detailed explanation of the classification and have given only a few examples at this point because each category will be considered in Chapter Three in connection with the subjunctives found in the writings of Foger Ascham.

Chapter III

THE SUBJUNCTIVE IN THE MAITINGS OF ROSER ASCHAM

I

My materials from Ascham represent some five hundred citations gathered from Toxophilus, A Leport on the Affairs in the State of Cermanie, and The Scholenaster. These citations include all vorts which express uncertainty whother they are formal subjunctives according to the notions of the classicists or not.

These materials I shall arrange and discuss according to the categories suggested in the preceding chapter and reviewed in the following outline.

- 1. the Subjunctive of Obligation
  - a) moral
  - b) legal
  - e) logical
- 2. the Subjunctive of Permission
- 3. the Subjunctive of Emotion
  - a) desire
  - b) prayer c) hope

  - d) foar
  - e) grief
- 4. the Subjunctive of Condition
  - a) present reality
  - b) potential reality
  - c) unreality
- b. the Subjunctive of Concession

- 6. the Subjunctive of Supposition
  - a) possibility
  - b) indecision
  - c) belief or hear-say
- 7. the Subjunctive of Limitation
  - a) of a person, object, or idea
  - b) of an action
  - c) of a purpose, cause, or reason
  - d) of time or distance
  - e) of action
  - f) of quality
  - g) of manner or degree

The categories used by grammarians in their discussions of the subjunctive, overlapping as they have been shown to be, give but a confused notion of its use. The bases for the present scheme are notional. In the case of each category I shall discuss the extent to which the means are formal or periphrastic, the extent to which the subjunctive occurs in dependent or independent statements, and the extent to which the traditional categories are amenable to the scheme.

II

The subjunctive of obligation occurs in statements of moral, legal, and logical obligation.

- 1. subjunctive expressing moral obligation:
  - a) "Furelye everye man ought to praye to God dayly." (T 28)
  - b) "A Prince in his herte must be full of mercy and peace." (T 33)
- c) "and so true to his master as he should be." (G 151)
  2. subjunctive expressing legal obligation:
  - a) "Hake proclamation to all mon---that everye scare persone have bowe and shaftes of his own." (T 47)

- b) "when lanes Stewart, --- corranged under payme of a greate forfyte, that everye Scott should learne to shote." (T 51)
- c) "the first statute & lawe that ever havid made after he was king, was this, that all ye children of Israel suide learne to shote." (T 40)
- d) "and sayde unto the ambassadours, you shall comende me to Cambyses." (7 41)
- 3. subjunctive expressing lowical chliquition:
  - e) "last of all howe it onet to be learned at onges men for the encrease of it," (T 6)
  - b) "naye sayeth he, you must take me as I weene:" (T 27)
  - c) "declarying in his Prologue just causes why he should do so." (G 168)
  - d) "Indeede you be to well known, by the same token the last type you were here you tooke a gobblet away with you, a therfore when you have dyned you may go without farewell, and have leave to come a sayne when yo be sent for." (G 158)
  - e) "Let your souldyers have they weapons wel appointed and trimed." (T 46)
  - f) "and In the meane whyle lot hym give thankes unto God, ---" (T 41)
  - e) "To that maketh perfitnes in the Latin tong his marke, must come to it by choice a certaine knowledge."
    (5 001)

In the first group we have expressions of duty to a divine power or to one's own sense of right. In the second group we have expressions of duty which result from legislation or royal decree. In the third group we have all expressions of obligation which are not of a noral or legal nature.

one employed the formal subjunctive, although obligation can be expressed as effectively with the formal subjunctive as with the expressions ought, must, and should. "It is necessary that he ask God for help" is quite as effective as "He must ask God for help," and seems more obligatory than "He ought to ask God for help or "He should ask God for help." Likewise, it is just as effective to say "The law requires that he pay his tax" as to say, "He must pay his tax." In the statement "It is the order of the King that he le put to death" there is no doubt of the obligation involved.

It is interesting to note that while the word ray is usually considered a word expressing permission, it is quite possible to use it at these to express obligation. The statement "when you have dyned you may so without farewell" expresses something stronger than permission.

Likewise, obligation is sometimes expressed with let, as in examples e) and f). "Let your somidyers have they weapons well appointed and trimeed" implies more than permission; it implies obligation. Also the statement "and In the meane whyle let hum gave thankes unto God" involves more than mere permission and therefore fits into the category of obligation.

of the 65 citations on the subjunctive of chligation, 36 used the word should, 18 used rust, 7 expressed the obligation with out to 2 with let, 1 with ray, and 1 with the inflectional form of the subjunctive. Of the 65 expressions of obligation 40 were in independent statements and 25 in dependent statements.

pressions of obligation. His nearest approach is under the category of wishes, prayers, and commands in the citation. Thy not this may well be classified as a wish. Under his discussion of Verbs of locality we find the citation "I should enquire after Fr. E." which expresses a form of obligation.

Traita classifies expressions of obligation under the importative mood giving as a citation "Therefore sweet lichard you shall come and you shall not say me may. (The Sentle Craft)".

Curse classifies obligation under Volitive Subjunctive.

"De must goi" "You shall do as I say!" He uses the past tense to express a modest or polite volitive as in "You should go at once!"

Poutsra pives a number of citations expressing obligation.

"The necessity of the time demands that our people put aside all unnecessary things and stand united against such a place.

- Neom. Gaz." "I shall give orders that my doors may no longer be open to you. - Fielding, Jos. Andrews." "A law passed in 1873 provides that eligibility to academic office shall not depend upon creed. - Daily Chron." "Our reader must now please to quit the woods and sea-shore. -Thack., Fend." "The kind reader will please to remember --- Track, Van. Fair." His citations included inflectional subjunctives and periphrastic subjunctives in both independent and dependent statements.

III

The subjunctive of permission is found in statements which express any type of permission. This type of subjunctive is not large enough to warrant more than the one category.

- a) "and therfore lette ran when there is no warre, use shootynge at home." (T )
- b) "Let your Scholer be never afraide, to ask you---" (T 134)
- c) "Nor let no man say, if they be honeatly used they do no harme." (T 28)
- d) "All this while, by mine admise, the childe whall nee to speake no latine." (3 185)
- e) "he shall not wee the cormon order in corron scholes, -- " (S )
- f) "where fooles chiefly, and flatterers may speake freely west they will and wise ren and good men shal corrolly be spect. -- (3 188)
- g) "A man raye (graunt) syt on a brante hyll syde, -- " (T 25)
- h) "Suffer these bookes to be read, -- " (S 231)
- i) "Two kindes of men--he will never long suffer to be in his house." (G 154)

The classification of some of these citations may perhaps be over to question. Permission and obligation tend to shade into one another, and in the last analysis Ascham is the only one who can say which is which. Certainly may denotes permission; yet the citation listed under obligation is sufficient evidence that it can denote obligation. The same seems to be true of let. In the statement, for example, "and therfore lette man when there is no warre, use shootynge at home" the intention is not to require, but permit, ran to use shooting at home. The statement "All this while, by mine addise, the childe shall use to speaks no latime" is more questionable.

I have considered expressions of permission as subjumetive for two reasons: 1. permission involves uncertainty.

"You may go to the party if you like" leaves the "going" most uncertain; there is a possibility that you will not go.

2. permission is closely related to obligation. Since obligation is definitely a phase of the subjunctive, it is logical to classify also permission as such.

Of the 27 citations expressing permission 17 use lct, S use may, 3 use ccall, and 2 use maffer. All but two were in independent statements.

Easten, Trnka, and Poutsma do not treat expressions of permission in their studies. Curro has the following paragraph under Volitive Subjunctive.

A mild form of expression of will is found in permissions: "You may (or can) so into the sarden," but "You may not (or here in negative form more commonly cannot) eat the fruit." If, however, the word may is used in a question, may is natural here in a negative answer: "Lay I go now?" - "No, you may not." In negative form must is used to indicate that permission is withdeld because it is not advisable or proper to do the thing in question: You must not go out into this wind. - You must not say such things. In questions we use may or can: hay (or can) I go now? hay and can are used in mild commands: Johnny, you may (or can) run along home now. 1

Mis explanation and examples are further evidence of the tendency of permission and obligation to shade into one another.

The subjunctive of emotion expresses the action or state of being that results from such emotional stimuli as desire, prayer, hope, fear, and grief.

1. subjunctive expressing desire:

- a) "& would fayne be at home---" (T 50)
- b) "Yould to God that these our men as they are ready to prayee hym were as willyng to follow him." (C 128)
- c) "Therefore, I wold wishe, that --- your ientlemen gold use, and delete in all Courtelie exercise." (S 216)
- d) "To speake of shootings Philologs, trulye I woulds
  I were so able, --- " (T )
- e) "Surely I would you had your wish." (a 186)
- f) "even so do I was c---that the landable costone of knylande---were not so decayed." (T)
- g) "Yea, I do wishe, that all rules for your scholers were shorter than they be." (5 200)
- h) "onely hee desired Crandewell that the Reperour would gave him leave to go home to his owne." (@ 149)
- i) "Vet this I woulds wysohe, that all creat men in Inglando had red over diligentlys the Fardoners tale." (7 29)
- j) "The medicine is this, that wolde to fed and the Kynge, all these unthriftie ydlo pastymes--- were made felonge." (T 31)

From the twenty-three citations expressing desire 7 were in independent sentences and 16 in dependent clauses. All of the independent sentences contained would and expressed an unfulfilled wish. "would have the Scholer brought up withall," empresses a wish that is still not fulfilled as does "I would have no flattery but wish for freedore." The following implies not only lack of fulfillment, but a possibility that there never will be a fulfillment: "procurying that to be two, witch God, nature, and reason, wold have one."

The dependent clauses are divided between inflectional subjunctives and periphrestic subjunctives, 6 in the first group and 10 in the second.

Present Subjunctive in wishes, prayers, and commands:

"reace to with Europedy!" (St. E. L.) "with helf that wish the wisher's eye be press'd! (Sh. E. D.) and under Inverfect Subjunctive (Outative Food), "I am the best of them that speak this language, were I but where this spoken!

(Sh. John.) "O, that I were a mockery Fing of srow"

(Sh. Lich. II)

Under the heading Verbs of Fodality he gives examples of mosht used to express a wish: "Fight I but live to see thee in my touch." (Sh. E. L.) Concerning expressions of wish in subordinate sentences he writes, "When the principal sentence contains a verb which expresses a wish, a demand, an intention, a tendency or a concession, it is frommently followed by the subjunctive mood as its result is doubtful and nearly demanded by our apletetive faculties, "Fut I beseach your grace that I may know the worst." (m. 1. p. p.)

Curme, in his discussion of Optative Subjunctive, lists, as one of the three categories, the "Subjunctive of Wish" with the examples: "God bless you!" "May you see many happy returns of this occasion!" "O were he only here!" "Could we only look forward in life and see as we do looking backward!" "Might I see her just once more!" "I would rather go now." "O might I have known it in time!"

He gives more examples of the subjunctive of wish in his discussion of subordinate clauses under Action desired: "She desires that he do (or may do) it." "It is my ardent wish that he come (may come or shall come) at once." "I wish I were dead!"
"I wish you would stay a little longer!"

Trnka includes the subjunctive of desire under "The Optative as Wishing Mood": "Long mayst thou live to wail the children's loss." (Franks, Shakespeare Gram.) - "That I had been born a king." (Massinger, City Madam) Under his heading Sub-ordinate Clauses he lists subjunctives of desire as That-clauses depending on verbs denoting a wish, doubt, hope, fear, necessity, or desirability. He gives only three citations, none of which belong to this category. In his section on periphrastics we find expressions of desire: "They wolde gladly that he might escape." (Berners) "He desired it might be now read." (Burton, Diary)"

Regarding the subjunctive of desire Poutsma says - wishes are often expressed, especially in rhetorical English, by exclamations which have the form of subordinate statements

introduced by that, or of adverbial clauses introduced by if, the principle sentence being understood or, to a certain extent, represented by the interjection Ohl or Ahl "o! that you could stay longer, dear lebeccal" (Thack, Van. Fair) - "O mother! Lother! that you were here!" (Thack, Lend.) - "Oh for another glimpse of it!" (Eurray)

2. subjunctive expressing prayer:

- a) "which, I praise God, Pepe out of England, and send also those of oures better mindes, --- (S 213)
- b) "whom I pray God kepe long still upon the stage."
  (@ 150)
- c) "for whome at England dayly doth praye, yt he--may set out and mayntague goddes worde."

  (Y 46)
- d) "But I truse Christe wyl so lychten and lift up Christen mennes eyes." (2 49)

The subjunctives in this category were equally divided between inflectional and periphrastic. All were in dependent statements.

Hasten gives the following citations expressing prayer in principal sentences: "Some heavenly power guide us out of this fearful country " (Sm. Temp.) - "Sod save such a lord." (Chaucer, inicit's tale). These are listed in the category of "Sishes, prayers, comards." The citations in dependent clauses are included in the category of "a wish, a derend, an intention, a tendency or a concession." "Fray heaven it do." (B. Jons. E. E.) - "Fray Cod your voice be not cracked." (Sh. 181.) - "God grant that we may come out with such a pure heart. (Thackeray). It seems an inconsistency to include the word prayers in one category and omit it in a parallel category. 9

Trnka gives one example under "verbs denoting a wish, doubt, hope, fear, necessity or desirability:" "Well, well, sayd he, I pray God some of us live not till that day."

(Roper)10

In Poutsma's study we find "God grant you become a braver man than he" (Kingsley, Westw. Ho!) "Henven send we be all alive this time to-morrow!" (Sher., Fiv.)11

Ourme gives the following examples under Subjunctive of Wish: "God bless you" "The Lord have mercy on us"
"Heaven forbid!"12

- 3. subjunctive expressing hope:
- a) "I trust that man, ---will yet thinke, that he is not---" (S 300)

  Although expressions of hope and desire are closely related, there is sufficient distinction to warrant two categories.

  "I wished he would come" implies a desire; "I hoped he would come" implies more than desire; it implies expected fulfillment. I found no citation in Ascham employing the word hope. The nearest parallel was introduced by trust.

<sup>9.</sup> Kasten, An Inquiry into the Use of the Subjunctive, 6, 13. 10. Trnka, On the Syntax of the English Verb from Caxton to Dryden, 70.

Kasten writes, "Verbs expressing hope or fear or an affect sometimes govern the subjunctive mood. I hope he be in love! (Sh., Much ado)"13 This is evidence that he recognized a distinction between desire and hope.

Trnka includes hope in the group denoting "What, doubt, hope, fear, necessity or desirability." He gives only three citations in this group none of which express hope. 14

Curme does not discuss this category.

Poutsma believes that the subjunctive is frequent in clauses which express what is the subject of a hope, and he gives several citations: "I hope I may never set eyes on it again" (Thack., Van. Fair) "I hoped the time might come --- " "She trusts that her mother will be found--- (G. Eliot. Dan. Der.) "I ventured to express a hope that she would not refuse to see him in his trouble" (Dick., Cap.)15 4. subjunctive expressing fear:

- a) "but ye be affrayd cosin (quoth ye Marches) lest this talke be to loud, --- (G 151)
- b) "but euermore kepes it under awe, that it darre do nothyng in the open face of the worlde, (T 23)
- c) "ruch fearyng, lest when he was absent in Germany, the Turke would be too nigh--- (G 130)
- d) "I feare, I should live ouer long." (S 297) This category, too, had as many inflectional subjenctives as periphrastic ones.

<sup>14.</sup> Traka, On the Syntax of the Verb, 70.
15. Pontsra, good and Tense of the English Verb, 26.

Kasten cites similar cases of the subjunctive expressing fear. "I fear it may be to take leave" (Shoridan) "I fear'd lest I might an er thee" (Sh. Temp.) "For fear lest day should look their shames upon---" (Sh. M. N. 1.)16

Trnka lists this use of the inflectional subjunctive under "verbs denoting a wish, doubt, hope, fear, necessity, or desirability" but does not include an example. Under an identical heading for periphrastic subjunctives we find, "The kyng feared that he shulde scape hym" (Berners)

Poutsma writes:

In literary English occasional instances are met with of the subjunctive in subordinate statements introduced by lest which express what is the subject of an apprehension. 17

He follows this with 21 citations of periphrastic subjunctives, all of which would fit into my scheme under subjunctive expressing fear. I quote a few to show the variety in phrasing. "I dreaded lest any stranger should notice me and speak to me" (G. Eliot, Dan. Der.) "I feared lest I should be deceived" (Bain, E. Gr.) "His terror was excited lest he might actually have seen his ancestor's shost" (Miss Tonge) "There is considerable anxiety lest the evacuation may be in some way evaded or modified" (Westm. Gaz.)18

Following these two pages of citations he concludes by saying, "The indicative is, however, distinctly the rule." 19

Curme does not include this category in his treat water.

- 5. subjunctive expressing regret or grief:
  - a) "It were pitie truly Phililoge, that the thinge shoulde be neglected." (T 16)
  - b) "It is pitie, that those, ---, be no more circumspect herein, than they are." (S 230)

It is interesting to note that the first citation employs the formal subjunctive in the main clause and a periphrastic in the dependent clause, while the second citation which parallels the first in meaning employs the indicative in the main clause and the inflectional subjunctive in the dependent clause.

Kasten gives the following citations, "I am grieved it would be said" (B. Jons. Ev. M.) "I am loth such a pot of pottage should be spoil'd" (Marl., Jew.)<sup>20</sup>

I found no mention of the subjunctive used to express regret or grief in Trnka, Poutsma, or Curme.

A

The subjunctive of condition is found in dependent clauses that express conditions of present reality, potential reality, and unreality.

<sup>19. &</sup>lt;u>Ibid, 42.

- 1. subjunctive expressing condition of present reality:
  - a) "and yf anye one be awaye, what so ever is done is done verye roundy." (T 58)
  - b) "if there be never so little fault in it, charge man seeth it, --- ( 22)
  - c) "but if you be borne or brought up in a rude countrie, ye shall not chose but speake rudelie." (5 255)
  - d) "For if shoting be a medicine (as you say that it is) it mayo not be used very oft, lest a man shuld burt himselfe with all." (m 30)
  - e) "yf he stande still in one facion, their mindes stande still with hym: If he thundre, they quake: If he chyde, they feare: If he complayee, they sory with hym." (# 15)
  - f) "If a manne lacke the first two, Aptnesse and Cunnyng, Use can do lytlo good, at all."
    (T 57)
  - (" 21) "If he have a wrentche, or have taken colde in his arme, he may hang up his love (I warraunt you) for one season." (" 21)
  - h) "for surely no Turkyshe power can overthrowe us, if Turkysshe lyfe do not cast us down before.
  - i) "if a curning wan have it in handling, I will set forth that one verse in all three tonges," (£ 204)
  - j) "But if the childe rises, ---, I would not have the master, elther frome, or chide with him," (2 183)
  - k) "And I trust no man will be missortent with my renorall saying except conscience do priobe him of his owne private doyng." (0.150)
  - 1) "The scholer shall winne nothing by Faraphrasis, but onelie, if we may believe Tullie, to choose worse wordes, --- (8 140)
  - m) "What great men do, le it good or yll, meane men communelye love to followe," (T 27)
  - n) "I will, God willing, go forward orderlie," (5 DDD)

The principal clause in each of these citations expresses a circumstance which is true or will be true provided the condition exists which is expressed in the dependent clause, i.e., provided the condition is a present reality. We find that this condition of present reality may be expressed by the present tense of the inflectional subjunctive, by may, or by an clliptical expression in which the verb is ordited, as in the last citation, which is another way of saying "If God be willing, I will go forward orderlie." The consequence of these conditions of present reality may be expressed by the present indicative, by the future, by would, or by may.

In citation k) we have a condition introduced by except.

Some grassarians consider this a condition of exception. 21

At first I had considered following the grassarians here and recognizing a fourth type of conditional subjenctive, but on further consideration it seemed unnecessary. I have come to the conclusion that conditions introduced by except are nothing more than negative expressions of conditions introduced by if.

Is not "And I trust no man will be miscontent with my generall saying except conscience do pricke him of his owne primate doyng" merely a negative statement of the condition "And I trust men will be miscontent with my generall saying if conscience do pricke him of his owne primate doyng" or "And I trust no man

<sup>21.</sup> Kasten uses the term condition of exception and exceptive condition. Poutsia gives examples of this use as a condition expressed by "a word other than if."

- will be miscontent with my generall saying if conscience do not pricke him---*.
- 2. subjunctive expressing condition of potential reality:

  - b) "if one game were harde, he might easelye learne an other:" (T 21)
  - c) "if it were turned into English it would leese the whole grace theref." (3 136)
  - d) "And surely yf I knews that I were apte, and yt you woulde teach me howe to shoote, I woulde become an archer." (T 53)
  - e) "if I communded them to runne into the toppe of this high castel, and cast thomselves downe backsward upon these rockes, I am sure the woulde do it." (T 34)
  - f) "I feare yf your companions which love shotinge, heards you, they wolde thinks you made it but a triflyng---" (T 12)
  - g) "but surely yf a foaste beynge never so great, lacked bread, ---, all the other daynties shoulde be unsavery, " (T 44)
  - h) "If the meaning and maners of some that do use them, were somewhat amended, it were no great hurt, neither to themselves, nor to others---" ($ 186)
  - i) "For if but two or three noble men in the court wold but beginn to shoote, all yong lentlemen, wold straight waie exercise shooting." (5 221)
  - j) "But if he would followe his counsell, he myght brynge to pass, that they shoulds nower more rebel a gaynet hym," (T 13)
  - k) "If a Master woulde have a perfite example to folow, let him read diligently--" (S 250)

- 1) "And therefore, if ye would speake as the best and wisest do, ye must be conversant, where the best and wisest are." (8 264)
- m) "If I shuld rehearse the statutes--, I could be very long." (T 8)
- n) "if a man shoulde describe a greate feaste, he woulde not ones name bread, although it be nooste common--- (T 47)
- o) "if you can prove me that scholers and men gyven to learning mays honestlis use shotong, I wyll soone grant you that all other sortes of men mays not onelys lefullis, but ought of dutie to use it." (T 10)
- p) "Therefore if you will nedes craunt scholers pastime and recreation of their mindes, let them use (as many of them doth) Nusyke, --- " (T 12)
- q) "Y' a man shoulds so to the myll or market with corne, and happen to spyl some in the ways, yet it wolde take roots and grove, --- "
  (T 56)
- r) "surelie the misorder of apparell in mean men abrode, shall never be amended, except the greatest in Courte will order and mend them selves first." (5 221)

All of the above citations contain conditions which do not exist at present but which could exist at present or may exist in the future. Since these conditions have all of the potentialities for becoming realities, I have chosen to label them conditions of potential reality. Some are expressed by means of the past tense of the inflectional subjunctive, some by the future tense, some by would, should, or can. The consequence of the condition is expressed by would, should, will, shall, could, must, wight, or let. Some of the consequences are expressed in the past subjunctive, as in

- a) and h). One consequence was expressed by the indicative,
  "I am sure", but it will be noticed that the independent clause is followed by a dependent clause in would. In this category we find conditions introduced by except. The final citation might be expressed: "Surelie the misorder of apparell in mean men abrode, shall be amended, if the greatest in Courte will order and mend them selves first." Since the citation is merely an if condition expressed in the negative, it can be classified as a condition of potential reality.
- 3. subjunctive expressing condition of unreality:
  - a) "yet I belove, if that noble Frince, king Frances the first were alive, they shold have neither place in 11s Courte, now pension in his warres, if he had knowledge of them." (3 213)
  - b) "Eurelye if I were one of the parliament house, I woulde not layle, to put up a lill--- (T 16)
  - c) "yea if I were .xx. scholers, I wolde thinke it were my dutie, both with exhortings men to shote, and also with shoting my solfe to helpe to set forwards that thing--- (T 11)
  - d) "that surelie (if I were a rich man) I had rather have spent a crowne: " (T 4)
  - e) "This face had bene more cumlie, if that hie redde in the cheeke, were somewhat more pure sanguin than it is:" (5 262)
  - f) "yf he had had bowsen, surelye there shoote mygote peradventure have bene a little hindered--- (T 49)
  - g) "If Sulpitius had had Flatos consideration, in right using this exercise, he had not deserved the name of Tragicus Orator,--- (S 255)
  - h) "If kyng Edward had lived a little longer, his onely example had breed such a rane of worthis learned ientlemen." (8 219)
  - i) "If Tuke Naurice had had a Machianels head or a cowardes hart, he would have worne a bloudyer sword the he did," (G 168)

j) "If the Emperour had kept faith with my master for Affrica, I would not have broken with them of Tripoly," (C 131)

The above citations express consequences of conditions which do not exist at present, or did not exist in the past, or cannot exist at any time. They may therefore be classified as conditions of unreality. These conditions are expressed by the past tense or by the past perfect tense of the inflectional subjunctive. The consequence is expressed by past perfect of the inflectional subjunctive, as in d), e), g), and h), or by would, should, or might.

The 173 conditional sentences examined fall into the following groups:

inflectional subjunctive in present tense 83 inflectional subjunctive in past tense 36 inflectional subjunctive in compound tense 17 periphrastic subjunctive 57 of the total number, forty-four contained the subjunctive of "to be". Fifteen of the 173 had an impersonal subject. Of the 37 citations containing periphrastic subjunctives, 15 used would, 8 used should, 6 used will, 2 used can, 2 used may, and 4 were elliptical.

Kasten makes this statement regarding the use of the subjenctive in expressing conditions:

Properly speaking the subjunctive mood does not serve to express a condition, it indicates merely a statement as being reflected on. In French we generally find the indicative mood, the pluperfect subjunctive, however, has been preserved by a sort of caprice of the language. As to English the indicative and subjunctive seem to be indifferently used. Even in Ags we meet with a certain confusion, where, however, as it seems, the indicative occurs when a whole period implies certainty, whereas the use of the subjunctive mood is occasioned by subjective motives of the person speaking, 22

Be follows this statement with over sixty citations which employ the formal subjunctive. An examination of his discussion of the subjunctive in expressing condition together with a few of the accompanying citations will show how his classification of conditional sentences corresponds with mine.

- 1. A condition is known to be real, nevertheless, it is expressed in form of a supposition.

  "If the proverb hold, that cannot be." (B. J. Ev. H.)
  - 2. A condition, the content of which is wished for, contains the subjunctive mood.

    "For if but once thou show me thy grey light, I'll find Femetrius." (Sh. E. D.)
  - 3. In sentences expressing a condition which in the present moment may correspond with reality, we frequently find the subjunctive mood:

    "If it be (written) give it re." (Sh. M. N. D.)
  - 4. In condition which, at any time, when realized, have a certain consequence, the subjunctive mood is preferred in a sential way of speaking:

    "Eumour is nothing, if it be not fed." (B. J. Ev. ".)
  - b. Conditional sentences referring to the future, imply in most cases a mere supposition, which is indicated by the use of the subjunctive mood:

"There is nothing done, if he return the conqueror." (Sh. K. L.)

l. As to the imperfect subjunctive it is employed for the sake of politeness in conditions referring to the past which, in the present, exercise no influence:

"On impreday, if he were in the house, why didn't he spouk?" (Dougl. Euthles)

- 2. The imperfect subjunctive is also used to denote a condition which may be realized in the present:

  "If I were fair, I were only thine." (Sh. M. W. D.)
- 3. In most cases where we meet with the imperfect subjunctive a condition is considered contrary to reality:

  "If I were Drutus now and he were Cassius, he should not humour me." (Sh. J. C.)
- The conjunctions so, so that, provided that introduce restrictive conditions, these, as mere suppositions follow the common rule.

  "Let 'em war, so we be conquerors. (Marl. Jew.)
- An exceptive condition is expressed by sentences introduced by the conjunctions: but, but that, without that, save that, unless, except.

  "Except it be to some choice spirits, I could not extend thus far." (P. J. Ev. 8.)23

His citations under 1, 3, and 4 of I fit into the category of conditions of present reality. Those under 2 and 5 fit into the category of conditions of potential reality. The first group under II might be considered as conditions of unreality. The citation "On Thursday, if he were in the house, why didn't he speak" implies that he was not in the house. Kasten admits the possibility of unreality in this condition, for he says, "Frequently the use of the subjunctive imperfect employed in this way, implies a doubt as to the truth of the assertion."24 The citations in 3 of II are definitely conditions of unreality. Those in 2 fit into the category of present reality. If we consider exceptive conditions as negative statements of other conditions, his final group will fit into my scheme. This haves only one group unclassified.

In my opinion they do not belong with expressions of condition at all, but rather with subjunctives expressing limitation of action.

Trnka lists six examples of conditional clauses which employ formal subjunctives and two which employ periphrastic subjunctives. He gives no explanations in connection with any of his citations. Each may be classified in my scheme. 25

Curme, as I pointed out in Chapter II, sub-divides conditions into: practical conditions, theoretical conditions, conditions contrary to fact, and elliptical conditions. Practical conditions may be conditions which exist in the present: if so, they may be classified as conditions of present reality. They may be conditions which do not exist at present but may exist at some time in the future; if so, they may be classified as conditions of potential reality. His citations "If annihilation shall end (or end) all our joys, it will also end our griefs*26 may be classified as potential subjunctive. Although he gives no citation under practical condition which expresses a condition of present reality, there is no reason why practical conditions could not be present realities. "If he be hungry, let him eat bread" might be classified under his scheme as a practical condition and under mine as a condition of present reality. His examples under theoretical condition, "If it should rain tomorrow, I wouldn't go" and "If he should go away without speaking to me, I should be grieved" may be considered condition of potential reality. 27 Condition contrary to fact is parallel to my category, condition of unreality. The examples of elliptical condition may be classified in my scheme according to the nature of the conditional clause which is not expressed. "He could easily do it if he tried" 28 may be considered a condition of potential reality. "I should say if I were asked that it were better to say nothing about it" 28 admits of the same classification. If the sentence read "I should have said if I had been asked that it were better to say nothing about it" we could classify it as a condition of unreality, since it implies that the speaker was not asked.

Poutsma lists four uses of the inflectional subjunctive in expressing conditions:

- 1) to express doubt or diffidence on the part of the speaker or writer as to the action or state being in accordance with fact.
- 2) to express doubt or diffidence on the part of the speaker or writer as to a future action or state coming into fulfilment.
- 3) to express that the fulfilment of the condition is necessary for the action or state in the apodosis becoming matter of fact, if having the value of provided.
- 4) to express the fact that a case is assumed for argument or is put in a general way. 29

Among the citations under 1) are "It is not necessary to let other nations into all our secrets and expose all our weaknesses, if such there be" and "My friend should, perhaps, have taken you along with him. But the slight, if there be one, was unintentional. *30 Both citations admit of the category of condition of present reality. His second category, corresponds with mine of condition of potential reality, as his citations prove: "If it assume my noble father's person, I'll speak to it, though hell itself should gape and bid me hold my peace."30 The citations under 3), i.e., "I will come to-morrow, if the weather be fine" and "Ordinary verse may pass muster if its manner be finished, --- "31 may be classified under condition of potential reality and condition of present reality respectively. The first two citations under 4), "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out" and "If England be the heart of international and cosmopolitan finance and London be the heart of England, the City is the heart of London, #31 are both conditions of present reality. The last citation, "If the bill pass the second reading, the House proceeds to consider and vote upon each clause in the bill separately, "31 is a condition of potential reality. Further on he writes:

The inflectional condition is used, also in the ordinary language of the educated, 1) in hypothetical clauses expressing a supposition contrary to some fact known to the speaker, ---32

It is evident without listing citations that this category is parallel to condition of unreality.

The subjunctive of concession expresses the "circumstance in spite of which" the action or state of being expressed in the principle clause is true.

- a) "And though the Marches be free to say what he thinketh, yet he is both secret in perposying & close in workyng--- (G 147)
- b) "if a man shoulde describe a greate feaste, he woulde not ones name bread, although it be most common--- (T 44)
- e) "and though a these come to the dore, and heaveth at it, to come in, and sleye hym, yet he lyeth in his bed, --- (T 47)
- d) "as one Halbinus through blinde affection, preferred his louer before all other wessen, although she were deformed with a polypus in her nose." (T 12)
- e) "It although it were a fonde * chyldish thing to be to ernest in pastime & play, yet doth he affirme--- (T 2)
- f) "although al the worlde were gathered in an army together, yet without shotings they can never come to they re purpose," (T 38)
- g) "though he had lost will yet would be not lesse his profite." (@ 161)
- h) "Much musike marroth mennes maners, sayth Calen, although some man wil saye that it doth not so," (P 13)
- i) "And although shooting mayo be mete sometyme for some scholers, and so forth: yet the fittest alwayss is to be preferred." (T 12)
- j) "And though, --- they can follow, fawne, and flatter, yet commonlie they allie themselves with the worst Papistes." (S 233)
- k) "he can not stoppe though he woulde never so fayne." (T 28)
- 1) "you may saye what you will for your pleasure, this I am sure--- (T 12)

Clauses of concession are usually introduced by elthough or though as in the case of the first eleven citations. The last sentence is evidence that a clause does not have to be introduced by one of these two words.

of the 32 citations expressing concession 11 were expressed by the present inflectional subjunctive, 9 by the imperfect inflectional subjunctive, and 12 by the periphrastic subjunctive (5-may, 4-would, 2-will, 1-can).

Kasten, Trika, Foutama, and Curme all include citations under the heading "concession." All are parallel to the citations from Ascham, and it would add nothing to the discussion to quote them at this point.

VII

The subjunctive of supposition occurs in expressions which express possibility, indecision, or belief. An examination of each category will show that they are closely enough related to be classified under one main heading, yet diversified enough to warrant sub-headings.

- 1. subjunctive expressing possibility:
  - a) "And therfore the quickest wittes commonlied may prove the best Poetes," (5 189)
  - b) "And this to be most true, ray easelie to gathered," (2 202)
  - c) "And wise men may say it was ye wisest deede---" (G 165)
  - d) "yet---may seems to be the breeder of any false reprodu." (3 145)

- o) "where truth in Peligion relate to fully tryed in the hearyng of even and equal ludges---" (C 156)
- f) "and therfore was glad when he saw the Marches might be made hys so essely." (G 181)
- g) "It right be either for the lacks of learning and good bringing up--or else for his bashfull nature in youth." (0 146)
- h) "harches Harignan told some in this court--Duke Haurice should become the greatest enemy to the Emperour that our the Emperour had."
  (G 167)
- 1) "I suppose it were better to make them of good Asshe, and not of Aspe." (T 85)

In all of these instances there is a possibility that the action will take place, but there is no guarantee that it will. In a) there is a possibility that the quickest wits will prove the best poets, but there is no guarantee that they will; therefore the statement is uncertain and consequently subjunctive in nature. In example e) there is a possibility that the wise men will make a statement, but with it goes a degree of uncertainty. In g) the possibility is expressed by might instead of may. Mad the statement read: "It may either for lacke of learning and good bringing up---" or "There is a possibility that it be from lack of----" the general meaning would have been the same. The last citation expresses possibility by means of "should."

2. subjunctive expressing indecision:

a) "And many menne doubtyng and fearyng whether they shoulds dye or no, even for verye fears of deaths, preventeth themselfs with a more bytter deaths then the other death shoulds have bene in deads." (T 15)

- b) "you shall so if swine r'll eate any Turkish fleshe." (6 132)
- c) "lette us se if shoting be not bindered amonges all kyndes of men as mothe otherwayes." (T 20)
- d) "A Lacedemonian taken prisoner, was asked of one at Athens, whether they were stoute fellowes that were slayne, or no. --- " (T 43)
- e) "it is not playno in Xenophon howe strong shooters the Persians were, what bowes they had, what sixftes and hences they occupied, what kynde of warre theyr enomies vaca." (T 33)
- f) "as when you be determined, whether yo will follow one or mo, to know perfitlie, and which way to follow that one" (5 266)
- g) "For fyrste a question mayo be asked, whether any other thing besyde a fether, be fit for a shaft or no?" (T 87)

Indecision or doubt are expressed in all of these citations. In a) the combining of the two words doubtyng and fearyng make the sentence more difficult to classify. Perhaps it should be included under subjunctive of emotion; but I am inclined to feel that the indecision expressed by "doubtyng" and wether --- or no justifies its inclusion at this point. In b) there is doubt expressed regarding the appetite and eating habits of the swine. In c) the formal subjunctive following lette us so if is definitely expressive of indecision. The indecision expressed in d) is intensified by the whether--or no. While the verbs were, had, occupied, and used could be indicative, the independent clause, it is not playe, labels it as indecisive and therefore subjunctive. The dependent clause in f) expresses indecision, following a subjunctive in the principal clause which intensifies the indecision.

- 3. subjunctive expressing belief or hear-say:
  - a) "And I suppose it be a great deal more pleasure also."  $(\underline{T}\ 2)$
  - b) "I wold think it were my duty." (T 11)
  - c) "I thinke they should fynde smal play and lesse pleasure in it at all." (T 47)
  - d) "And this quicke medccine I beleve wolde so thorowlye pourse them, that the daylye medecines, --- shoulde easelyer withstande them." (T 31)
  - e) "And I trust no man will be miscontent with my senerall saying." (G 150)
  - f) "it is said that letters from the greatest in the Emperours Court were never lackyng." (3 149)

This third category includes expressions following such verbs as thirt, believe, expect, suppose and expressions of hear-say.

Although some of these citations employ the inflectional subjunctive and some the periphrastic form, all express supposition.

Which admit of classification in this part of my scheme.

"I wote not whether the revenging steel were hardned" (Sh. F. Q.), "I leave him to judge whether it be not very pleasant" (Marryat), "I wonder if Titania be awaked" (Sh. M. D.), and "I think this be the house" (B. J. Lv. M.)<sup>33</sup> all express indecision or mere belief and therefore may be classified as subjunctives of supposition. Under "Verbs of Modality" he gives "It might be done that way. "34 This indicates possi-whether the woman were created according to God's image" as a deliberative indirect question. Since it expressed indecision, it may be classified as a subjunctive of supposition. So also may we classify the periphrestics which he includes under "that-clauses depending on verbs denoting doubt:"

"He doubted that the Frenche kyng wolde in the nyght tyme come and overrun the cytic of Farys" and under "deliberative indirect questions: "We knowe not what shall daylie fall." In Curme we find such expressions as, "It may rain"
"It might possibly be true" "This would seem to confirm his statement" "He thinks it may rain" all of which may be sonsidered subjunctives of supposition. 37

In Poutsma's citations under "The Subjunctive in Subordinate Questions" we find: "We doubt whether there be a hundred genuine Bengalees in the whole army of the East India Company" (Mac., Clive) "The blowing of the horn---made me hestitatingly inquire--if there were anything to pay." (Dick. Cap.). 38 These belong in the category of indecision and may Trnka classifies "In that book there is a doubt made, whether the woman were created according to God's image" as a deliberative indirect question. Since it expressed indecision, it may be classified as a subjunctive of supposition. So also may we classify the periphrastics which he includes under "that-clauses depending on verbs denoting doubt:"

writes "In literary English the subjunctive is fairly common in subordinate statements expressing what is the subject of a proposal, a suggestion, or advice. Thus especially in the language of deliberative assemblies or bodies. 'I propose that the matter be put to the vote at once!' (G. Eliot, Fid.) - "I also suggest that the ceremony take place before the departure." (Dor. Gerard). "39 Could not these citations, which involve possibility, be considered subjunctives of supposition?

The subjunctive of limitation is found in dependent clauses which limit the meaning expressed by the independent clause when uncertainty is involved. This subjunctive may be used to express limitation of: 1) a person, object, or idea; 2) a cause, reason, or purpose; 3) time or distance; 4) action; 5) quality; 6) manner or decree.

- 1. subjunctive expressing limitation of person, object, or idea:
  - a) "be he never so worhipfull a man, ---, that burte him in dede." (T 22)
  - b) "for pleasing any that he alone," (@ 163)
  - c) "I know also many a good mitio, which have played long partes when I pray God kepe long still upon the stage." (G 189)
  - d) "some in England, that would have the people neither witty nor wealthy when wit is the meare gift of God:" (Q 141)

<sup>39.</sup> Poutsma, Mood and Tense of the English Verb, 30.

- e) "he that wold have an example of it, let him read Lucian -- " (S 260)
- f) "and drave him areye that woulde robbe hym and sleye hym." (T 40)
- g) "as to give trewe adulse to them, that may be great hereafter." (5 222)
- h) "more mischief then he neede." (G 167)
- i) "or some other part of Tullie, --- which your scholer may not know where to finde." (5 239)
- j) "and I could describe the nature of a quicke medicine, which shoulde within a whyle perce and plucke oute all the unthriftie games in the Fealme,"

  (T 31)
- k) "I cannot much prayse his wit, which might have had the Emperour in his handes & would not." (@ 166)
- 1) "There is a weie touched in the first book of Gioero

  De Oratore, whiche, wisclie brought into scholes, truely taught, and constantly used, would not onely take---, but would also, --- worke a true choice---"
  (2 185)

The first seven citations contain a subjunctive that limits a person, the next four contain subjunctives that limit an object, while the last contains a subjunctive that limits an idea. Some employ the formal subjunctive; others the periphrastic. All of them express uncertainty in their limitation. In citation f) the dependent clause limits the meaning of him, but it does not give factual information. The clause "that woulde robbe him and slove hym" does not express positive action that will take place without fail, but uncertain action that may possibly hap, on at some indefinite time. In citation j) the dependent clause limits the meaning of medicine, but it does so with uncertainty.

Kasten includes examples of this category under "Use of the Subjunctive mood in relative sentences."40 In the citation "With power to excite all who in future time may appear" the clause "who in future time may appear" limits the meaning of all and at the same time implies uncertainty; therefore the verb may appear may be considered a periphrastic subjunctive expressing limitation of person. In "Thou hast stolen that which, after some hours, were thine without offense" the clause "which, after some hours, were thine without offense" limits the meaning of that, and so the verb were may be classed as an inflectional subjunctive expressing limitation of an object. As an example of a subjunctive used to express limitation of an idea we may cite, "I hither come engaged by my eath (which God defend a knight should violate)."40 The clause "which God defend---" limits the meaning of eath.

Trnka gives us more examples of subjunctive of limitation in "What someuer he be, he is comen of a noble blood" and "Who may see hym lyue he shal preue a good knyghte." which he lists under "relative clauses."41

Curme classifies this use as "Potential Subjunctive in Attributive Relative Clauses": "It is a book that may help many a poor struggling fellow" "I offer a reward to anyone who shall give me the desired address" "Can you give me one good reason why you should always answer so peevishly?"42

<sup>40.</sup> Kasten, An Inquiry into the Use of the Subjunctive, 22, 23. 41. Trnka, On the Syntax of the English Verb, 71.

Although Poutsma has no category which parallels this use of the subjunctive, he has a citation which fits into the category: "I wish to publish a book that shall create a stir and make me famous" (Marie Corelli)43

- 2. subjunctive expressing limitation of cause, reason, or purpose:
  - a) "lest, his outermoch fearinge of you, drive him to seeke some misorderlie shifte: (S 104)
  - b) "And now take heede, lest your scholer do not better in some point than you yourselfe," (S 240)
  - c) "& because he would rake a lusty chaunge from the feare of God and knowledge of Christ's doctrine, he fell to be a peruerse and bloudy Papist."
    (G 150)
  - d) "yet that you may know what secret workyng went before this playne writing and open doyng, ---, I will by more particular circumstaunces lead you to this generall complainte." (G 145)
  - e) "they woulde kneele downe on theyr knees, and so cover all theyr body with theyr shyldes and targottes, that the Parthians shaftes might slyde outre them, & do them no harme, --- " (T 30)

In this category the clause of limitation is introduced by lest, because, or tlat. The subjunctive may be the inflected form as in examples a) and b) or it may be the periphrastic as in c), d), and e).

"Intentional sentences": "Let go thy hold, when a great wheel runs down a hill, lest it break thy nech." (Sh. K. L.)

44. Kasten, An Inquiry into the Use of the Subjunctive, 21.

Under the classification "Final clauses" Trnka lists one inflectional and one periphrastic. Poth may be included in this group: "And that we ordeyne --- st che provysyon and defence that our countrey receive no blame" (Berners) "What socuer thynges are written a fore type, are wrytten for our learnynge, that we---might have hope" (Latimer, Seven Sermons)45

Curne includes subjunctives of this category in two places in his scheme: 1) and orbinal plauses under "Optative Subjunctive" as "I'll go early that I may get a good seat". "I went early that I right get a good seat " 2) Clauses of Cause under "Potential Subjenctive" as "Let us act and not simink for fear (or lest) our motives be misunderstood" "I trembled lest you should be seen" "She was afraid to breathe lest she break (or should break) the wonderful spell of the magic." It is unfortunate that in this second group Curme included only examples that commote fear, for all of these shade into the subjunctive of emotion expressing fear, and it would have been possible to include examples that would not be so limited in meaning.

Poutsma writes:

Adverbial clauses of purpose sometimes have the predicate in the inflectional subjunctive when introduced by that, rarely when opening with the more colloquial so that, and rather frequently after the purely literary lest.

To emphasize the notion of purpose in order that, for the surpose that and, more or less archaically, to the intent that or to the end that, are sometimes used instead of the simple that. -----Clauses introduced by lest may often be apprehended to express rather a relation of cause (reason or ground) than purpose, this conjunction frequently appearing to have the value of because it is (or was) feared or a phrase of like import. ---- 48

From his six and a half pages of citations expressing purpose a few will be sufficient to show that they are parallel to the citations from Ascham included in this category. "And busy caterpillars hasten, That no time be lost." (Rossetti, Swerce) "Take heed, lest passion sway thy judgment." (Eliton, Far. Lost) "All they would do was to give a loaded pistol, lest we were attached." (Stevenson, Types. Isl.)

"Te sat with the door wide open at all times, that he might hear the footsteps as they entered." (Bick Chuz) "Ho one supposes for a moment that they gave anything in order that the gift right be talked about." (Acad.) "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whoseever believeth in him ghould not perish, but have everlasting life." "And I will sing that they shall hear I am not afraid." (Sh. N. N. D.)

- 3. subjunctive expressing limitation of time or distance:
  - a) "so farre, that he can nover retourne backe, untyl he he so lyght, that he nede feare no thought by the waye." (T 26)
  - b) "further then any man now dore iourney by land either for pleasure or profite." (@ 158)

- o) "& seldome they wyl leave a man before he come eyther to hangyng or els somme other extreme misery." (T 24)
- d) "woulde suffer be to reade of it, when I woulde."  $(\underline{T} + \underline{S})$
- e) "Octoavio --- was so feared of Conzago that he thought hym solfe never assured for Petro Luis death as long as Octavio his sonne ghould lyue!"

  (3 133)
- f) "whilest some fitter time should discouer some better remedy," (G 102)
- g) "And commonly he would not heare them whilest an hundred suters aloud come at once."
  (6 140)
- h) "Yet when his talke stalke beard, or his writing be red, --- that Nimium in him, ---, shall eyther of thies two, bite his lippe, or shake his heade at it." (2 260) can never retourne backe, and a limitation of distance, that he be so lycht, as well as a limitation of quality, that he nede feare no theres by the waye. (the latter belonging in the sixth category of limitation) As in the other categories we find inflectional subjenctives and periphrastic subjunctives.

Hasten lists three groups of "Temporal Sentences" which employ the subjunctive.

1. --sentences marking a point of time as merely supposed in the present or future, bear the character of incertainty, and they, therefore, frequently contain the subj. mood:

"At any time it please you, you shall find mo ready." (B. J. Ev. E.)

"Men cannot retire when they would, neither will they when it were reason." (Bacon)

2. In temporal sentences introduced by till marking the aim up to which an action extends, the subj. mood is frequently found.

"We may not chaunge till we be bathed."

(Sp. F. Q.)

"Thy love ne'er alter till thy sweet life end."

(Sh. M. N. D.)

3. When an action is expressed which follows another, the idea of incertainty as to its realization may be admitted, indicated by the subj. mood. This usage extended, and is also adopted in cases not at all doubtful. The conjunctions employed are: ere, before.

"Long ere it were day." (Chaucer M. P. T.)

"Serve it upon him quickly, afore he be aware."

(B. J. Ev. M.)

"until before me stand this rebel chieftain."

(Scott) 49

Trnkm gives three citations of inflectional subjunctives used in temporal clauses and three citations of periphrastic subjunctives in temporal clauses. "Syre Ector wold not awey til Gawayne were hole." (Nalory, Norte d'Arthur) 50 "Ye may well amende it whan it shall please you." (Berners, Froissart) "He cast him into prison, till hee should pay the debt." 51

Curme writes regarding the subjunctive in temporal clauses:

In temporal clauses after until, till when, whenever, before, acainst (-before), ere, we employ in choice English the modern subjunctive with shall, in older English and in poetry also the simple subjunctive, to represent a future act, not as a fact, but only as the outcome of circumstances, the result of a development, or as planned, desired: "Your father is going to wait till your uncle shall come" "The most forward bud Is eaten by the canker ere it blow." (Shakespeare) 52

ibuteba writes that the subjunctive is fairly com on in adverbial clauses of time wrich describe an action or state of the fetre, expecially after fre and "in a less decree" after preinct, before, and until, but that it is rore after whom. Among his citations are: "My some illusion see thou bring her here: "I'll come "in a compaint one go appear." (M. f. h. h.) - "This about before the cock area, thou small deny me thrice." (Firle) - "The rost forward bud is caten by the casher ore it blow." (the Two Cont.) 53 Fe gives further citations to show that the formal subjunctive is frequently replaced by the perighrestic with small, particularly after until (or til) and gion. "Is see going to lace a lonely visil till that time gight core?" Appuld according to footens is found frequently: "He was nert into prison till he should pay the debt." - "This decided him to part with the boy wherever he could be found." (Lytton Bight and horn).54

There were no emples of subjunctive used to empress limitation of distance in any of these studies, but the frequency with which this use appears in the writings of accing justifies its inclusion in this cate cry.

- 4. smi junctive empressing lightstion of action:
  - a) "his conswere was that he so abhorred the aleddyna of blond in others as he would never much his hands in any." (4 132)

- b) "he would sooner have driven all Possyondes out of Germany, then they should have burt hym in Eamony," (@ 100)
- c) "Some men of our tire, ---, have so over respired trem selves, ---, as if onch they had bene true is up in some cohole in soit," (8 143)
- b. subjunctive expressing limitation of quality:
  - a) The had won thereby such favor in all Cormany, as without all doubt, he had bene hade condictor with the kind of localnes his uncle," (3 186)
  - b) "twose Instrumentes rake a raises wit so notion smooths to derive and qualitie, that they be lesse which to brooke, stronge and tournestudy." (** 13)
  - c) "The wole body of the kynnopre of Hiples was so distempered inwardly with t is disorder, with a little outward occasion it would easely have lunct forth into a foule sore." (3 142)
  - d) "For God in takyng away one flownyard hath made Naples now more strong, then if the Departure had not ax. thousand of the best in Spayne Unite:" (2 162)
- 0. substrative expressing limitation of tunner or degree:
  - a) "came so hastly and so hotely as the porour could not alide the hotel of his breath." (g 166)
  - b) "and returning to his play as quietly as though he had received so o private letter---" (@ 104)
  - c) "or love may none then he should." (2 187) of quality, and lie tation of rameer or degree are found less frequently than the other extegories of surjunctive or limitation, and therefore we do not find citations for all of them in the lawsstipations of the scholars.

nusten recognized a subjenctive which limits action and wholen when he whote under "Subjunctive rood in sentences of modulity:"

1. Subordinate sentences expressing the manner in which something is done, in some cases adults of the subj. mood.

A comparison may be made between different subjects doing the same action or between different actions conmitted by the same or several subjects. The subjects mood is most frequently found with the latter kind, especially when the parallel is drawn between reality and an action supposed or wished for.

"Yet even in beginners (it were best) to adhere so moderately, as he be a man of the one faction which is passablest with the other" (Bacon)

"Speak truly, --- as so defend thee heaven and thy valour" (Sh. Fich. II)

"Smile upon my speeches as if I were a fool" (Sh. Eml.)

"Use him as if he were a philistine" (Farl. Jew.) 55

Under "Comparative clauses" Traka gives two citations, both of which express limitation of action. "You look as if you had something more to say" (Sh. K. L.) "Now am I better pleasyd, sayed Pryamus, than thou haddest gyuen to me all the provyace and parys the ryche!" (Morte d'Artgur) 56

Poutsma includes under the heading "clauses of disjunctive concession (or alternative hypothesis)" citations which may be classified as limitations of action. "Whether it be beast or man, it shall not live." (Pible) "But be it hap, or be it hams, We tread the pathway arm in arm" (Scott, Prid. of Trierrain, 57 United Schaues of hypothetical similarity" we find more citations which admit of this category. always talking about honesty, as if he were the only honest man in the world." (Aweet, N. E. Gr.) - "They argue as if (though) the matter were doubtful." (Onions, Advanced Eng. Synt.) - "Gwendolen felt as if her heart were making a sudden gambol." (G. Fliot, Pan Per.) Under this same classification are citations which express limitation of manner.
"I treat her as tenderly as if she were my daughter."

(The Finc's English) - "So far from intending you any wrong, I have always loved you as well as if you had been my own mother." (Fielding, Jos. Andrews) 58

The 74 citations from the writings of Aschem which I classified as subjunctives of limitation are divided arong the 6 categories as follows:

- 30 expressed limitation of person, object, or idea
- 14 expressed limitation of time or distance
- 12 expressed limitation of cause, reason, or purpose
  - 8 expressed limitation of quality
  - 5 expressed limitation of manner
  - 5 expressed limitation of action
- of the 74 citations 28 were inflectional and 46 were periphrastic. An examination of the citations expressing limitation disclose three facts:
  - 1) The limitation which they place upon some word in the independent clause is a limitation of uncertainty.
  - 2) The limitation answers one of the questions: who? what? why? when? where? how?

3) The subjunctives which express limitation of person, object, or idea are found in adjectival clauses; the subjunctives which limit cause, reason, purpose, time, distance, action, quality, manner, and degree are found in adverbial clauses.

Chapter IV

SUMMARY

It is possible at this point to draw some conclusions from the study I have made.

1) concerning the treatment by the writers of textbooks

The amount of space which the writers of textbooks have devoted to a study of the subjunctive varies from no space at all to several pages. Some textbooks include both inflectional forms and periphrastic forms in their discussions and exercises, some only the inflectional, and some only the periphrastic forms (calling them "modern substitutes for the subjunctive").
Some include several uses of the subjunctive, while others limit its use to conditional clauses contrary to fact.

There is a growing tendency on the part of teachers and supervisors to fall in line with Charles Henshaw Ward, who advocates the elimination of all mention of the subjunctive from the courses of study in English.

2) concerning the treatment by scholars

There is as wide a divergence of opinion among the scholars as among the writers of textbooks regarding the form and scope of the subjunctive mood. Some hold to the opinion of the classicists that only those verbs are subjunctive which have the inflectional ending of the subjunctive; others admit of two types of subjunctive, inflectional and periphrastic; others refer to the periphrastic forms as "substitutes for the subjunctive."

<sup>1.</sup> The junior high schools of Lansing, Michigan ruled the subjunctive out of the English course of study in 1943. The senior high schools ruled out all except the subjunctive in conditions contrary to fact and the subjunctive expressing prayer: God be with you, etc. (Course of Study in English)

The majority of scholars who have made extensive studies of the subjunctive have recorded their findings in poorly organized schemes which confuse notional classification and grammatical classification. I have made some attempt to eliminate some of the confusion by classifying the categories according to function.

3) concerning the subjunctives in the writings of Roger Ascham

The subjunctives in Toxophilus, A Report on the Affaires and State of Germany, and The Scholemester may be divided into the following groups:

subjunctive expressing condition -35% subjunctive expressing limitation -14% subjunctive expressing obligation -13% subjunctive expressing supposition -13% subjunctive expressing concession -10% subjunctive expressing emotion -10% subjunctive expressing permission -5%

Ascham has employed both the inflectional forms of the subjunctive and the periphrastic forms. Approximately one third are inflectional, and the remaining two-thirds are perighrastic. I have observed that these statistics hold not only for the citations as a whole, but for individual pages. To illustrate the point, I opened William Uright's edition of Ascham's Facilish Works constend the subjunctives that appeared on two consecutive pages (pages 50 and 51). Of the 16 subjunctives on the two pages, 5 are inflectional forms, and 11 are periphrastic forms, giving the ratio of 1 to 2, which I found in a count of the total number of citations.

All seven types of subjunctive were represented on these two pages, with the greatest number of citations falling under subjunctive of condition and subjunctive of limitation, with subjunctive of mp.osition and subjunctive of obligation appearing next in frequency. Subjunctive of permission, which was found least frequently in the total count, was represented on these pages with one citation. The subjunctive of emotion and subjunctive of concession which together accounted for 20% of the subjunctives in the total count, represented only

I quote here the subjunctives from pages 50 and 51 as they admit of the classification I have followed.

1. subjunctive expressing obligation:

"And here I must nedes rescriber a certaine Frenchman--"

2. subjunctive expressing permission:

"they woulde suffre them no longer to be two"

&quot;commanded under payme of a greate forfyte, that everye feette shoulde learne to shote."

- 3. subjunctive expressing emotion:
  - "I---would fayne be at home---"
- 4. aubjunctive expressing condition:
  - "yf they were to reken agayne, I wold not ones name them,"
  - "if I were discosed to do it, and you hadde leysure to heare it, I coulde soone do as Textor doth."
  - "Textor neaded not to have fylled uppe his booke with suche lyes, if he badde read the storye of Scotlande,"
- 5. subjunctive expressing concession:
  - "but as for shotinge, they neyther can vee it for anye profyte, nor yet wil chalenge it for any prayse, although master Textor of his gentlenesse wold give it them."
- 6. subjunctive expressing supposition:
  - "This sentence--, may be called in question and doubte."
  - "that Textor -- myght very soons, even in the first towns of Kent, have founds suche plentie of shotings,"
  - "wherein he gyphte have learned, that when Iames---"
- 7. subjunctive expressing limitation:
  - "I am now affectioned even as it were a man that had bene longe wanderyng in strange contries ---
  - "of one that would some to be fitter for a shop in dede than to write any boke---
  - "and reken up suche a rable of shoters as wolde holde vs talkyng whyles tomorow"
  - "the receyvings of anye profyte that myght come by it."
- Although some of the inflectional forms in the above citations are plural and therefore might be considered indicative, I am convinced that they are intended as subjunctives in these instances because they are parallel in structure and meaning to numerous citations containing the subjunctive in the singular.

Through the examination of some five hundred citations from the writing of Roger Aschem I have some to the conclusion that an idea of uncertainty may be expressed equally well by means of periphrastic subjunctives and inflectional subjunctives. The citation from Toxophilus (47) and though a thefe come to the dore" may also be expressed by using any one of four periphrastic subjunctives without losing or gaining in effectiveness. Thus he might have said "and though a thefe may come to the door," "and though a thefe might come to the door, " "and though a thefe shall come to the door, " "and though a these should come to the dore." On the other hand, on page 56 Ascham employs the periphrastic form where the inflectional would have been equally clear: "That is a wonder to me, yt the feare of a displeasure, shoulde do more harme than the displeasure itselfe. " Would it not have been equally clear to say, "That is a wonder to me, yt the feare of a displeasure do more harme than the displeasure itselfe?" The subjenctive of supposition in the citation "And I suppose it be a great deal more pleasure also, " might have been expressed with the periphrastic may be, might be, would be, must be, or even stall be.

4. concerning the decline of the subjunctive

I am not in accord with the grammarians who maintain that the subjunctive mood of the verb has practically disappeared from the English language. It is true that there are fewer inflected forms in use now than there were prior to and at the time during which Ascham was writing, but it is not true that there are fewer subjunctives.

Life is equally as full of doubts and uncertainties and desires today as it was in the sixteenth century and before, and mankind is equally prone to giving them verbal expression. This being the case the subjunctive is here to stay. The proverbial mother of the young bride was offered the consolation that she was not losing a daughter but gaining a son. We may offer the same consolation the grammarians who be lieve that with the decline of the inflectional forms of the subjunctive we are losing that mood of the verb entirely. We are not losing the subjunctive; we are gaining more subjunctive. By adding the periphrastic forms of the subjunctive we now have four or five choices of expression where we formerly had but one. The addition of the periphrastic subjunctive is another step in the enrichment of the English language.
