A GRADED PROGRAM OF OUTSIDE READING FOR AMERICAN CHILDREN BEING EDUCATED ABROAD

Section I. Introduction.

The problem was suggested to the writer by the fact that the four children of the family, now under seven years of age, will be educated in South African schools or in the home under a governess using the South African syllabus. The writer has observed that children brought up under any foreign system of schooling, using foreign books exclusively, will become in the course of their primary education alienated from their parents' country and will, besides, feel awkward and uneducated along many lines upon their return to their parent country for secondary or college training. This feeling of strangeness would undoubtedly be greatly modified for them by a comprehensive program of reading in American books.

There are a great many Americans living in key cities all over the world for long periods of time. They find it hard to know what kind of books to order for their children. The result is that they manage either to get along without giving their children American reading matter, or trust to chance in ordering books, or follow the materials presented in one set of books. They have no means of knowing whether or not the author of such a set of books is recognized professionally.

The present writer, therefore, decided that there was a need for a special bibliography of children's literature which would limit the books chosen to characteristically American ones, the excellence of which has caused them to appear in many catalogues and library lists.

Before beginning the process of selecting books for the American child being educated abroad, the writer felt that it was essential to set up authoritative criteria to govern his choice: first, criteria of literary excellence; second, criteria of children's interests in reading; third, specific aims involved. These would all combine to limit the list of books chosen.

The criteria for literary excellence as selected by Mr. Chung Shang<sup>1</sup> from the writings of eleven authorities on children's literature seemed to be scientifically sound, and simple enough to be usable. Mr. Shang was able to integrate the standards of literary excellence of these eleven authorities under nine heads. He discarded four of these because they were of such minor importance that only one or two authorities listed them at all.

The five remaining criteria for literary excellence as stated by Mr. Shang are:

- (1). Harmony of thought and expression.
- (2). Vivid concreteness of described experiences, action and imagery.
- (3). Sincerity of expression.
- (4). Organic unity where major and minor activities are well coordinated.
- (5). Permanence of appeal, resulting from the realization of the basic and primary interests and values.

Mr. Chung Shang wrote his master's thesis on the subject of A Method for Selecting Foreign Stories for American Elementary Schools. He felt that there was too much literature on Chinese subjects in American libraries for children, some of it good, some obviously unsuited to the child, and some unfair in its representation of Chinese life and literature. He went into a long process of gathering several hundred Chinese tales, translating them into modern Chinese terminology, re-translating them into good English with the aid of other students to whom English was native, and then eliminating, from the standpoint of suitability to the child's age and emotional level, from the standpoint of criteria of literary excellence, and from the standpoint of children's interests in reading.

Much of the first spade work in choosing the American books to be included on her lists had already been done for the present writer. Her purpose was different from the other in that the stories chosen were for the reading of the American child. However, like the stories Mr. Shang's list, they would be useful to a foreign librarian or a foreign compiler of American children's literature in that they would represent the consensus of opinion of experts on the subject of children's interests in reading and would represent books that have been popular with American children through the years and are therefore typically American in sentiment and setting.

The next step was to formulate standards for weeding out books that were not interesting to the child and for including the books that would appeal to the child even if they were not of high literary rank.

W. L. Uhl<sup>1</sup> in determining what should be the content of the elementary school course in reading, lists children's interests in reading as follows:

- (1). Dramatic action, adventurous and heroic.
- (2). Interesting characters of home life and child life.
- (3). Fairy and supernatural.
- (4). Kindness and faithfulness.
- (5). Interesting action as differentiated from dramatic.

Fannie W. Dunn<sup>2</sup> states that the chief interest factors in primary reading material are (1) surprise, (2) plot, (3) animalness, (4) childness, (5) familiar experience.

Arthur Jordan<sup>3</sup> sums up children's interests in reading under six topics.

- (1). Love of sensory life (visual exploration).
- (2). Internal feelings (kindliness, etc.).

- (3). Rivalry (mastery and fighting).
- (4). Approval and scornful behavior.
- (5). Fellowship.
- (6). Original attention.

Miriam Huber<sup>1</sup> gives a list similar to Uhl's. According to Miss Huber, children's interests are governed by:

- (1). Fancy; the unreal; supernatural; delicate symbolism.
- (2). Humor; grotesque, tumble-down elements of humor; humor of plot and incident.
- (3). The unusual experience; adventure; any realistic stirring happening.
- (4). Heroism and service; heroes and patriots; civic responsibilities.
- (5). Familiar experience; familiar life and intimate social relationships; things that have happened to the child himself or would be likely to happen to him.

Grant and White<sup>2</sup> have briefly summed up the matter in the following divisions: animal, fairy, folklore, poetry, children's experience, information, historical.

Terman and Lima<sup>3</sup> class children's books as (1) stories of adventure and mystery, (2) stories of home and school life, (3) emotional fiction, (4) fairy tales, (5) nature and animal stories.

Mr. Shang<sup>1</sup> in his Columbia thesis, A Method for Selecting Foreign Stories for American Elementary Schools, selected the following criteria from the foregoing lists as those being most helpful:

- (1). Dramatic action, adventurous and heroic.
- (2). Interesting characters in home life or child life.
- (3). Surprise.
- (4). Animalness.
- (5). Plot.
- (6). Fairy and supernatural.

Although the present writer used almost the same authorities as Mr. Shang and had a similar problem to solve, the set of criteria found most helpful in classifying American books was the Terman and Lima set, supplemented by the Grant and White list as above noted. This was due to the fact that the program of reading was planned to include some strictly informational material as well as fiction, which necessitated the addition of further criteria.

The writer's list of criteria for selecting books for the American child being educated in a foreign country is therefore as follows:

- (1). Adventure and mystery.
- (2). Home and school life.

<sup>1</sup> Shang, Chung I. A Method for Selecting Foreign Stories for American Elementary Schools. New York: Columbia Univ. 1929. 46pp.

- (3). Emotional fiction.
- (4). Fairy tales.
- (5). Nature and animal stories.
- (6). Informational material.
- (7). Historical interest.
- (8). Rapid dramatic action.
- (9). Heroism and service: heroes and patriots, civic responsibilities.

The third step in formulating a program for selecting books to fulfill the needs of the problem was to set up the specific aims of the outline of reading proposed. These are:

- (1). To inculcate the ideals of American citizenship.
- (2). To teach history, biography, and geography.
- (3). To familiarize the child with American folk-lore and fairy tales.
- (4). To familiarize the child with American literature.
- (5). To familiarize the child with the American scene, (trees, flowers, birds, landscape, topography, and so on.)

In using any group of books in the social studies field, the teacher should keep in mind the general objectives of the social studies. Since such a large part of the writer's lists of books deal with geography, history, citizenship and other related subjects, and since the desire to preserve the American ideals of citizenship was the actuating motive of the thesis, it is fitting that a brief resume of the objectives of social science should be inserted here.

Franklin Boebitt in "How to Make a Curriculum" lists the objectives of the social studies and the kinds of guiding principles and assumptions that are needed in outlining a course of study. He states that a survey is needed to ascertain facts as to the activities of the good citizen, but the technique has not yet been worked out. Meanwhile, anyone working out an independent course of study should bear in mind some definite objectives.

Briefly summarized, Bobbitt's<sup>1</sup> objectives for the social studies follow:

- (1). A sense of membership in and sharing in the total social group, rather than in some special class.
- (2). A sense of the need for and the inherent dignity of all classes and groups.
- (3). Ability to organize and use social facts effectively in arriving at conclusions, using general principles.
- (4). Continual reliance upon facts and principles instead of prejudices.
- (5). Ability to discern the character and extent of social obligations and duties.
- (6). Ability to read one's rights as things earned.
- (7). Ability to see social relations so clearly as to discern the duties and rights of others.
- (8). Disposition to avoid waste.
- (9). A sufficient knowledge of the laws that one is expected to obey.

- (10). An understanding of the social-service labors that have been involved in our present institutions.
- (11). Ability to organize and express ideas clearly on social problems.
- (12). Ability to choose wisely a specialized occupation.
- (13). Ability and disposition to talk and act tactfully.
- (14). Habit of observation and reading (indirect observation) as enjoyable leisure occupations.
- (15). Ability to see one's environment as a vast and restless sea of forces and phenomena, infinite in extent, subtlety, and complexity.
- (16). Ability to participate in the best type of religious and philosophical thought.
- (17). Ability to follow the world's Men of Vision.
- (18). Ability to read with ease, use the library properly, use and make maps, graphs, diagrams, and statistical tables.

In the fiction lists that follow, the reader will notice that there is a preponderance of very recent literature. The book for the juvenile reader has only lately received artistic cultivation, and has recently achieved comparative perfection. It will be of interest to compare the literature of the early nineteenth century with that of the latter half of the nineteenth century. Where there existed not a single book of value at the beginning of the nineteenth century, there were at least five hundred juveniles of real merit at its end, and the twentieth century has seen new dignity and new vitality in the field of children's literature. The opinion of the editors of the Cambridge History of American Literature was that up to 1920 the writing for children had reached an eminence that American literature showed in no other department.

The survey of nineteenth century American literature conducted for the Cambridge History of American Literature<sup>1</sup> showed that the earliest American books for children had one purpose in mind only, that of religious and moral instruction. Even the Children's Magazine (Hartford, 1789) made almost no attempt to reach the child's level. In Noah Webster's Spelling Book (1783), eight short illustrated fables formed the only concession to childish interest.

Our first juvenile books were by preachers or their maiden relatives. Down to 1890, the old-fashioned Sunday School book sold in enormous quantities. Its heroine was usually a feeble child during a long, harrowing illness, who died after converting someone. In the Elsie books by Martha Finley, the ministering child reached a burlesque of itself. The Youth's Companion, established in 1827, took a lesson from the perseverance with which death had been dangled before juvenile readers and banished the word from its pages. From its beginning to the present time, (now called The Youth's Companion and Boy's Life) this children's magazine has distributed lively and wholesome entertainment.

Although, before the end of the nineteenth century, America was to lead the world in its special literature for children, the chief authors of the first half of the century did not intentionally contribute to the field of children's literature. Cooper's stories bequeathed to a later generation the Indian, the Yankee trader, and the Scout; but neither he nor Irving in Sleepy Hollow and Rip Van Winkle, nor Dana in the book that still remains one of the most popular with boys, Two Years before the Mast, wrote directly for them. Nor did Mrs. Stowe, although her Uncle Tom's Cabin is now read almost exclusively by children.<sup>1</sup>

The one author of general fame who wrote some stories especially for children was Nathaniel Hawthorne. Soon, however, the advent of several excellent children's magazines, caused the literary attitude to change. Charles Eliot Norton thought it not beneath his dignity to edit a boys' library (the Heart of Oak books).

The magazine, St. Nicholas, became in itself a library of choice literature for children, and most of the children's books of the nineteenth century appeared in it first. At the present time, the St. Nicholas poetry, songs, nature and animal stories, and St. Nicholas material of many other kinds have been re-edited in handy volumes. They represent the best of the material for children that has appeared in the columns of the magazine.

The most notable success of the 1860's was made by Louisa

Alcott, whose work for adults, however, was only mediocre. Out of the incidents of her own girlhood, she wrote Little Women (1868), and its abiding charm lies in its atmosphere of real life and its real portraits.

The informational trail first blazed by Goodrich and Abbott soon grew to be the main road for future juveniles. Jane Andrew was the pioneer of the great crowd of present day nature writers for children and her work still compares in interest and dignity of treatment with that of her successors.

The nineteenth century saw also the rise of a new department of biography for children, until at the present time there is an enormous list of biographies written from the viewpoint of the child's interests. Since children form a great many of their ideals through reading about people and since the period of hero worship should be sustained upon good literature, the list of biographies includes individual biographies of many great Americans and collective biographies of special kinds.

In the group of informational fiction is included that of historical fiction. It is necessary to bear in mind that in some of the nineteenth century books, history and fiction are so well combined that it is hard to tell where history begins and fiction leaves off. The Egglestons were especially good at giving a plausible feeling to their fiction. However, it is well to know that the American historical fiction of the nineteenth century was more credible and the background more accurate than the historical fiction of their English rivals of the same time. Charles Carleton Coffin's historical series from Colonial times to the close of the Civil War presents in story form the best short histories of the campaigns they cover. Noah Brook's Boy Emigrants presents frontier life accurately. John Bennett's Master Skylark belongs to the highest type of historical juvenile.

The quite unusual idea that children's naughty moods could be legitimate material for juvenile writers was first introduced by Trowbridge in Quido's Cave, Kaler in Toby Tyler, Aldrich in his Story of A Bad Boy, and Samuel Clemens in Tom Sawyer (1876) and its sequel, Huckleberry Finn (1884). The two last named have become world classics, although they are still looked at askance in some children's libraries.

The distinct Americanism, so noticeable in Mark Twain, was an important characteristic of American juveniles from very early times. It was the impatience that children began to show at always having to read about people in an English, or otherwise unfamiliar, setting which turned the attention of so many writers to the possibility of employing local color in juvenile literature. This accounts for the fact that one can get more of American life from the juveniles of the nineteenth century than from the adult fiction.

More conscientious and intelligent work has been done in American writing for children than has been the case anywhere else in the world. This is due in part to the analytic study of child life fostered by our early appropriation of the kindergarten theory.

In the realm of pure fancy, American literature lags far behind European. In fairy tales, Frank R. Stockton stands almost alone in having done any considerable quantity of work possessing literary value. The wise, humorous style of his fanciful tales and their grotesque droll material make them exceptional. Fairy tales seem to have no foothold in America. For this condition the editors of the Cambridge History of American Literature blame the publishers, as they can sufficiently supply the market with uncopyrighted European material for which no royalties need be paid.

In the writing of folk-lore, the name of Joel Chandler Harris is preeminent for his creation of Uncle Remus. He has in this old negro performed the difficult task of harmonizing an individual character with a typical character. Old Uncle Remus sums up the past and dimly hints the future. He can be compared with Cooper's Chingachgook in that, although he is the fore-runner of that particular type in fiction, he is in himself the last of his race, the old plantation negroes.

No mention is made in the Cambridge History of Indian folk-lore and fairy tales. There is a tendency in literature about the Indian to surround him with a mystic halo, a romantic, unreal atmosphere. Since, however, Indian fiction at its worst, is a part of the background of the American child's reading and at its best inculcates all the American ideals of freedom, love of adventure, and love of nature, the writer considered it essential to include a representative list of Indian fiction and folk-lore. It is especially valuable for giving the child an intimate acquaintance with the American scene as it was before the motor-car and the gas-station came to sully it.

In considering American poetry for the child, we find that the best verse has been scattered through magazines and newspapers. A few good anthologies have gathered these together. However, librarians report that few children ask for poetry, so it has been the tendency to leave the poetry scattered and inaccessible in the magazines. Clement Moore's A Visit from St. Nicholas has become a nursery classic. Mrs. Hale's Mary Had a Little Lamb has had the continued popularity of the Mother Goose jingles of England and for the same inexplicable reason.

Eugene Field and James Whitcomb Riley consciously wrote poetry for children, but unfortunately the point of view is too adult to make them acknowledged children's favorites. There are several living writers of conspicuous artistic success. Among them are numbered Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, and Edna St. Vincent Millay.

The anthologies of children's poetry by Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Archibald Smith, Golden Numbers, Stevenson's American History in Verse, for Boys and Girls, and Carhart and McGee's Through Magic Casements are especially valuable.

A section of the lists has been devoted to plays for children, since the writer thinks that through acting plays of American setting, helping to arrange the scenery, and speaking the words of American plays before an audience, a much deeper impression would be made on the child than through any amount of reading. The collections of plays for holidays is especially complete.

The books that are starred in the lists are those that have been especially recommended by the Cambridge History of American Literature; or have been recommended for first purchase by the American Library Association or by Minnie Sears in the Children's Catalogue; or have been chosen after personal reading (by the writer) of the book itself or of authentic reviews.

The following information only appears in the graded lists of books: name of author, name of book, publisher, date of edition recommended, price, grades for which the book is recommended (only if the suggested grading varies in some way from the grade-grouping at the head of the list), and a few comments which the writer of the thesis thought would be helpful to anyone consulting the lists.

Full addresses of the publishers mentioned in the graded lists will appear in the appendix. In the two bibliographies in the appendix, the publisher's name and address are included in order to make these bibliographies complete enough to be useful to scholars.

Section IV.

SUMMARIZING STATEMENT

These lists of books are designed to teach American citizenship, biography, history, and geography, and to familiarize the child with the American scene (trees, flowers, birds, landscape, and topography).

These reading lists should be useful, not only to parents of children being educated abroad, but also to parents and to librarians in this country who are building up small libraries for children, since a list of strictly American books should be an excellent basis upon which to build. Not all libraries can afford a complete, annotated catalogue of children's books to guide the librarian.

The thesis has been compiled from the point of view of a college trained mother, to whom three years teaching experience in the schools of Michigan, and six years of residence in a foreign country have given a clear insight into the types of books that are most typical of America and most valuable to the American child, both at home and abroad.

The compilation should also be useful to librarians in foreign countries who wish to enrich their libraries by adding the best American juveniles. The lists, being selective and graded, should also be a help to translators in choosing American books to translate into foreign languages. However, the primary usefulness of this thesis will be to the Foreign Mission Boards, whose workers are scattered all over the world for long periods of time. Since the writer had six years of actual experience in the foreign mission field before starting to compile the thesis, she has a practical knowledge of the difficulties that missionaries face in obtaining American material to supplement the particular courses of study pursued in the various countries in which they work. The writer's hope is that this thesis may furnish help that has previously been unavailable.
