

PREHISTORY OF THE TRANSVAAL

A Record of Human Activity

Revil Mason

Repr. 1969, 498 pp. Cloth. R16

Illustrated in colour and in black and white, line drawings, maps, tables.

"In a book which attempts to cover half a million years, it would be as well to give the reader some preliminary encouragement. He might wish to know why the archeology of the Transvaal is worth looking at, and whether it has such spectacles to offer as Teotihuacan or Knossos. Although there is nothing as opulent as these, the Transvaal can offer quieter treasures that lie at the roots of human thinking. Here are no golden helmets, no marble gods, no sumptuous temples. All that came later, after the hard work of becoming human had been done, and it is of those earliest upward steps that the Transvaal can boast a record. Here we may claim to add to the general understanding of man's position on earth, his habits and interests, his mind and his muscles. The Transvaal has a special advantage in this, for it remained undisturbed by civilization until very recently: not long before Bach wrote his fugues and Spinoza composed his Ethics, Iron Age people broke the first farmlands and displaced the last Stone Age hunters south of the Limpopo."

DEVELOPMENT IN AFRICA

A Study in Regional Analysis with Special Reference to Southern Africa

L. P. Green and T. J. D. Fair

Repr. 1969, 203 pp., maps and tables. Cloth. R4

This is a work of historical interest describing the development of political, social and economic progress in Africa, and the patterns of settlement and movement of its peoples. The revolutionary changes that have taken place are infinitely complex, particularly because of the great contrasts existing from place to place in the physical environment, and in the distribution and use of the natural and human resources. In this book the authors sought to blaze a trail through this intricate maze, to uncover basic principles and process of development in Africa.
