Gloves, Old and New.

Gloves were articles of great value, for according to Xenophon they were worn by Cyrus the Persian, and Athenians speak of a celebrated pair of gloves which came to a banquet...

In ancient times a glove was employed as a token or pledge of faith in the making of contracts...

Before the union of England and Scotland, the borderers having once pledged their faith to an enemy, regarded its violation as a grave crime...

A fur-lined glove, worn by Henry IV, is still preserved in the old mansion that gave him shelter after the disastrous battle of Hexham (1464).

The embroidered gloves of Cleopatra lost him his liberty at one time, and might have cost him his life.

Queen Mary and her sister Elizabeth took pride in the art of dress. It is said that the latter was extravagant in the extreme about them, and that a marvelous pair was at one time presented to her that was enclosed in a waxed shell.

The enormous quantity of so-called kid gloves is greatly in excess of the amount of leather afforded by the skins of all the young goats annually killed to supply the demand.

Paris-green. We are of the opinion now, as we have been for several years past, that the most economical way to apply Paris-green is to mix it with plaster rather than with water.

Again much of the water applied falls to the ground. A part only is retained on the leaves, while nearly all of the poisoned plaster, if skillfully applied, falls upon and is retained by the leaves until the next rain.

The Extravagant Tailor. Gilbooley, who was very rich in debt, happened to pass down Austin avenue, headed into a restaurant, and saw Sapp, his tailor, with some friends, regaling themselves with champagne and tempting viands.

"What does this extravagance mean?" asked Gilbooley, who is remarkable for his impudence, as he stalked into the restaurant.

"It is none of your business," said the tailor, indignantly. "Yes it is my business. Here you have been dunning me for the last two years to pay for that pair of pants you made for me, saying that you needed your money, whereas, if you had your money, you would not have bothered me with sending them bills."

"I wish I had a neck as long as a giraffe," said Willie, one day, as he posed Farmer Ploughman's orchard.
