Deep Plowing Useful and Injurious.

One intelligent, practical farmer will tell you his experience has shown conclusively that deep plowing is of the greatest importance...

How do plants get the materials that increase their bulk? Mainly from the air. A loam made up almost wholly of sand and clay, after growing two or three tons per acre of clover...

Without discussing the question how much comes from each source, we know that the sap conveys the food both from leaves and roots, and deposits it here and there...

The sun's warmth greatly assists the preparation of the food material collected by the leaves, adapting it for plant nourishment. We speak of warm growing weather...

It is not plain then, that if a soil is plowed deep and made fine, so that air will penetrate deep and the plant roots be thus enabled to reach the soil...

But not always. The porous prairie soils are usually in fair condition a foot deep or more...

The right way, with such soils, is to go down an inch or two annually, and bring up a little new soil each time...

Many a vigilant housekeeper would be spared much vexation of spirit, if she understood the domestic arrangements of the moths as well as she does her own.
