which afterward proved true in every detail.

The two were lovers from the extreme northern part of Sweden. They were the children of sheer folk, very poor. They had despaired of marriage at home, but one day walked away together, reached a seaport town, and there both, with hard labor, had earned enough money to come across the ocean and to Kansas City. The interpreter was her cousin. He was also poor and had a family.

"Magnus has a place in the railroad yards," explained the cousin; "he live with you. After while they have money and they get married."

It was finally decided that Christina Erd should come to us. The lover was to bring her chest from the railroad station at once. It arrived in an hour.
