the lines which read: "Some village Hampden, who with dauntless breast Libe little tyrant of his native fields withstood." The brave man whose opposition to tyranny was so strong as to make his name an appropriate metalism for the poem was John Hampden, an English patriot, who was born in 1594, was first cousin to Oliver Cromwell, the "Great Protector." For many years he served in the British parliable for the people against the encroachments of the government. When the final rupture came and parliament arrayed itself against King Charles, Hampden raised a regiment and went to the war.
