Secretary Gage, upon being informed of the death of President McKinley, and requested to make some comment upon the latter's life, said: "It seems like mockery to attempt to eulogize him. No words can carry derstanding of that unique personality. He himself must be his best interpreter. His acts, his utterances, with their indescribable charm have made him known to all Americans. Through these they understand and appreciate him. In their hearts can be found the love and the gratitude which his unselfish, untiring and affectionate devotion-to his country justly inspire. If I speak of him it must be simply and without exaggeration. In an active life, extending now over a long period, I have met many men of great powers and manifold graces, but after nearly five years of close association with this man, and a constant study of his mental and moral characteristics, I have come to regard him, in the combined qualities which make a man truly great, as the superior of all the men people, are indeed stricken with the
