STANDARD'S CHIEF ATTORNEY

John S. Miller, chief attorney for the Stand ard Oil Company in the Indiana rathroad rebate cases, which have just come through the United States court of appeals with a reversal, which means a great victory for the Rockefeller forces by the lifting of the $29,240,000 fine assessed by Landis, is one of the best equipped attorneys practicing in the federal courts. 'A short ore he entered upon the trial of the Standard Oil cases in Chicago he whipped the United States to a standstill in the beef trust cases, and by so doing led President Roosevelt to rage in a special message to congress against the law that prevents the government from appealing from "an unjust decision of a federal judge." He also had charge of the John R. case for the defense, and has been in much important litigation in the past few years. Miller is a Chicago man and was corporation counsel under Mayors Hempstead Washburne and George B. Swift. In that capacity he won several big cases for the city. He is 58 years old, a man of family and known in clubdom as "a jolly good fellow."

When Judge Landis assessed the $29,240,000 fine against the oil men Miller was disconsolate. The oil men were correspondingly enraged, and while Miller assured them that he could knock out the verdict in a higher court, his clients had much doubt in his claims. The lawyer persevered, however, and maintained his position in the matter. He carried the case up to the appellate division, and when that tribunal declared in his favor the attorney was

The inception of the "immunity bath" is credited to Miller, who coined the phrase when he successfully yanked the beef trust packers out of the court's grasp just before sentence was to be pronounced against them. He secured a verdict and defeated the national department of justice.

PRINCE OF WALES IN AMERICA

George, prince of Wales, who is now in Canada where he went to take part in the Quebec centennial celebration, may visit the United States before his return to England. Europe can boast few scions of royalty who have the personal popularity of the British heir apparent. He is the second son of the king and came to the succession by the death of his elder brother. Prince Edward, in January, 1892. In appearance he resembles his father somewhat, and his plain and dislike for ostentation have endegred him to the English neonle. He is a got his service having begun when he was 12, and at 27 he was made a commander of the royal navy. He was in command of the gunboat Thrush when he previously visited Canada and in that capacity he was permitted to indulge his own desire for quiet strolls about the streets of old Quebec and for plain ningling with the officers about the clubs upon equal terms.

On the present occasion, however, he has seen the city under different conditions. He is the second man of the kingdom now-its future king-he with dignity and state, while his own actions are codfined within comparatively narrow limits. While in Quebec he occupied quarters that were elaborately furnished and decorated in the old citadel, that grim and frowning fortress that looks as grandly terrible as it did in other days when it had some claim in being literally the "Gibraltar of America."

it is not so much an impregnable fort now and might be taken without much difficulty, perhaps. It has a rugged grandeur, nevertheless, that can hardly fail to impress the observer.

The prince is accompanied by his wife and a brilliant staff, headed by Lord Roberts, the veteran whose praises many writers besides Kipling have delighted to sing.
