With our cheroots burning fragrantly, we bowled along very chartily and feli regretful that we had not a longer run beforeus. Nothing worthy of notice had happened until the driver ordered his fireman to make up the furnace.

Sooramungalum being upward of 200 miles from the sea, coal or compressed patent fuel would be too costly to burn in the engines on account of the ex pense of bringing it from the coast; besides coal perishes very rapidly under a tropical sun. Therefore, the furnaces , are constructed to burn wood, of which there is a fair supply available from the company's jungle reserves. Of course all fuel is precious and drivers must take the fat with the lean -that is, roots as well as logs.

Now, snakes very much affect the hollow crevices of roots of old tree India and thus they are frequently carried into the wood-yards at the railway stations and thence are occasionally transferred to the enginetenders.

This was exactly our case. As the fireman took up a log to throw it into the furnace down dropped a lively cobra on the footplate. It was not a very large species of "spectacles"— about 4 feet long—but a.1 foot hooder is quite enough to grant a passport to the stoutest man that ever hopped and to-frank him to that country from whose bourne no traveler returns. So being four human beings on that foot-plate. and consecuently being somewhat crowded we skipped back with much alacrity. Unfortunately none of us had a stick or the matter could speedily have been ended. As it was, all we could hope for was that the reptile would glide off the engine and drop on worth $2 if in good condition. the track.
