The 300th Military Police Prisoner of War Command, an Army Reserve Unit based in Dearborn, will undergo its annual active duty for training for a twoweek period starting July 12 at Camp McCoy, Wisconsin.

The Command will act as a major control headquarters and will supervise the training of Army Reserve military police to Omaha.

Colonel Arthur F. Brandstatter, professor and director too light. of the school of police administration and public safety here, is the unit's commander.

"During these two weeks," Col. Brandstatter said, "the men will apply the lessons learned in the classrooms at their training centers to the solution of practical exercises involving their military skills and judge-

Feurig also emphasized the importance of the quality of the

Everybody makes decisions, she says. We have been doing it for years. But knowing how to make decisions is the most difficult part of the whole process. Young people must be taught how to think, not what to think!

"The burden of making intelligent, rational decisions must be the creek each month to feed. shared by each of us," she says. the fish." 'The effect of these decisions will affect others, too. The tools of decision making in our lives are but two, scientific information and the art of defining the most important decision by seeking War. possible alternatives and weighing each in terms of the conse-

One of the reasons why knowing how to make decisions is important to everyone is that our knowledge is increasing rapidly. The answers needed to solve todays's problems must be made by competent people. Then too, today's people are more mobile than in the past. Distances are smaller compared to 50 years ago, she said.

Paolucci pointed out that there are three kinds of decisions in today's world. The "how to" decision involves making choices about technical things. Four-H, with its increased emphasis on science, teaches rural and urban youth how to make technical decisions. Clearly defining the problem and seeing which route is the best to choose in making creative citizens are what they are learning.

The economic decision is more difficult to make than the technical decision. "The problem is that you may have competing ends," she said. "You must first find what is important about the end and then decide what makes this possible. The scarce resources with which we have to work makes this decision difficult."

Social decisions involving group action rather than one person are the most difficult to make.

MSU Press Publishes Wide Variety Of Books

State News Staff Writer

Many persons think the small building at the corner of Shaw Lane and Hagadorn Road that houses the University Press is the office of the State News, or a printing plant for University publications, or only slightly more correct, a printing and publishing service for the use of departments of the University.

Lyle Blair, associate professor and director of the press, emphasized that it is none of these things.

"A University Press is as much a professional operation as a department of English. It's not a jobbing printer."

The University Press was originally opened about 15 years ago as a service to the University, to publish standard commercial texts. But, Blair said, it has grown since then and now publishes a wide variety of books in a broad range of subject areas. The press is responsible for such University classics as the natural science and social science series of paperback texts prepared by MSU faculty members. In addition to these, about 25 per cent of the books published by the press are the work of faculty

"However, most of the books that we publish are submitted to us in the normal course of events," he said. He emphasized that neither the number of books published nor of copies sold is of primary consideration in evaluating the operation of a publisher, commercial or otherwise.

ACROSS FROM THE UNION BLDG.

He noted that the press two years ago published "A Dictionary of Agricultural and Applied Terminology," an extensive scholarly reference work prepared over a period of five years by a team of editors. Blair said that the combined effort that went into the publication of this one volume could have gone to the publishing of perhaps 20 smaller books.

Two members of the history department are currently preparing the complete diaries of President James Garfield, a fivevolume set which will be published in two or three years. Blair said Robert Brown, professor, and Frederick Williams, associate professor, found in their research that Garfield's papers had never been published and were in the possession of his son, who

They obtained possession of the diaries and turned them over to the Library of Congress. The University Press was given complete publishing rights. Blair said that several other works published here have become definitive works in their fields. He noted Frederick J. Hoffman's and Olga W. Vickery's book, "William Faulkner: Three Decades of Criticism," and two books by Russel B. Nye, professor of Controversy, 1830-1860," and "Midwestern Progressive Politics: 1870-1958" as examples.

The MSU Press has become a standard publisher of works in the general area of midwestern history, Blair said. But neither this fact nor the fact that the press frequently deals in University texts deters authors from submitting manuscripts on any topic. Blair said that at least 20 manuscripts are turned down for every one that is accepted for publication. Many are the works of faculty members at other universities, a result of the "terrible pressure on scholars to publish." He pointed out that there is no shortage of books written by university professors, but that it is necessary to select the valuable works from the total of all

Once a manuscript is turned in and accepted for publication by the press, it is edited, designed and prepared for production by the press' staff. This includes a permanent staff of six and a varying number of student employes selected for their ability and their interest in publishing work. Blair said the press is currently employing four students.

Once the book is designed and edited, the work that goes on in Blair said this is standard procedure for most university presses. Universities will hesitate to install their own printing equipment because of the costs and problems involved.

"A printing press is a hungry monster," he said, "and when great pressures are applied to keep the press rolling, standards are ant to drop.

Blair said that the operation of the MSU Press is "about the average size of a Midwestern university press." Again emphasizing the idea that volume sales are not the most significant aspect of a press' operation, he said that sales are about 100,000 volumes per year, in large part due to sales for the "captive courses" of University College.

The influence of the press can in part be measured by the comments which appear in scholarly journals, he said, and by the area which is covered by the sales of books published here and by the manuscripts which are turned in.

Sales orders come in from booksellers and libraries all over the United States and from overseas, and manuscripts have been submitted from such countries as Russia, China and Austrailia.

A photographic display of outstanding recent work in the field of landscape architecture is being shown in the Union Concourse through July 24, as part of the Fine Arts Festival.

The display was prepared through the Hubbard Educational Trust and The American Society of Landscape Architects. It is designed "to increase public awareness of the scope and function of professional landscape architecture in our rapidly expanding society."

Short explanations of the function of the landscape architect in a variety of professional situations accompany the large photographs of examples of his work. Landscape architecture is the design of urban and community developments, residential areas and public service projects intended to create a more livable and pleasant atmosphere.

The photographs on display in the Union portray the work done in a variety of types of projects, such as civic design, design of commercial and recreational areas and highway planning.

The new machines, plus the latest innovations in pruning and chemical weed control, will be demonstrated in the John Steimle and Herbert Teichman orchards.

Now, with the support of the Latin American Translation Program, it appears in English in an edition that will bring Professor Anderson's careful documentation and brilliant literary intuitions to a new, large auddience of North American readers. The translation's appearance is well-timed. More than ever before, English-speaking peoples are today acknowledging the presence and the accomplishments of the Spanish American cultures.

The book's organization is admirable. Offered in chronologically arranged periods, beginning with New World's first half century (1492-1556), the book's fifteen chapters present the gradual development of the principal genres (prose, poetry, and drama) in the nineteen Spanish American countries. Each chapter is set in what Anderson calls its 'historical framework' and the corresponding period is labelled with its princiapl "cultural tendencies."

The selections begin with the poetry of Nicaraguan Ruben Dario (1867-1916) and lead up to ers. Represented, for example, in the latter category are both the prose and poetry of Argentine Jorge Luis Borges (1899-) who only two years ago shared with Samuel Beckett the International Publishers' Prize of $10,000 for outstanding contribu-

When Comedy Becomes Tragedy In Mid-Air

By RICHARD SCHWARTZ State News Sports Editor

It started with a laugh, and it ended with a laugh.

In fact, except for a tense split-second, everything about the acrobatic-comedy diving of water clowns Hobie Billingsley and Dick Kimball had a showstopping hilarity not to be found in most

It was that tense split-second, however, that made Tuesday's water buffoonery at the men's intramural pool, and other similar affairs in the past, as hair-raising as a high wire act at Ringling Bros. Barnum and Bailey Circus.

If you blinked you might have missed it.

But even among those who spotted the hazardous situation, it is doubtful that the action--none too uncommon in this business--could have had the same impact for them as it did for a brilliant three-and-a-half somersault to handclapping approval.

Water Accident Once Fatal

Only several years earlier, a freak accident involving a similar tower routine took the life of Bruce Harlan, the man who preceded Kimball as Billingsley's partner.

While not occurring in the actual performance of any diving act, the mere circumstances surrounding the tragedy are a constant reminder to Kimball of the possible consequences of high tower situations.

"You can be sure that every time either of us crawls the tower, we think about it," said Kimball, who is head swimming coach at the University of Michigan.

"Usually the sites where we perform require our installing a portable tower," Kimball said. "While we may set the equipment up well over a hundred times each summer without the slightest occurence, we don't care to press our luck by any careless act." Both Kimball and his senior partner, however, discount any undue danger in trick diving.

"I'm more afraid of something happening to us when we're on the road than when we're in the air doing a stunt," Kimball said. "Whereas you know exactly what move to expect from your partner while diving or tumbling, you can never be sure what your road partner might be up to.

"And when you travel 20,000 miles a year as we do—tugging along a thousand pounds of equipment -- you're not free to execute the quick decision you might in a routine," he added. When it's showtime, many calculated risks may be taken, according to Billingsley. "We use special pre-recorded tapes for all our performances," the Indiana swimming skipper said. "After constant repetition of each stunt, we are able to time every body movement to the precise note in the background music." Even in the event a mishap should occur, Billingsley explained, every effort is made to keep the show rolling--and the people

"It doesn't make any difference how you feel," he added. "Your head can ache, your stomach spin or your nose bleed. It doesn't matter. Only a serious injury can put the clamps on things." And such injuries do occur.

Injury Figures Low In Intramural Sports

The intramural program isn't hurting.

At least that's the report from IM Director Harris F. Beeman concerning the number of injuries reported during the past year in IMsponsored athletics.

The report, which included touch football, basketball and softball injuries, showed that a total of 243 probable injuries resulted from the contests, but only 131 were of a nature serious enough that the students who sustained them had to report to Olin Memorial Health Center for treatment.

Of the total number of injuries, 89 were self-inflicted, or resulted from action by the individual himself and did not involve contact with another participant. Such injuries resulted from diving to catch a fly ball and jumping to shoot a basket.

Only 14 of the injuries were termed major, 10 involving the upper extremities of the body and 4 involving the lower. The most common injury sustained was a sprained ankle, which occurred 19 times during the year. Knee injuries were the next most frequent, occurring in 14 instances, followed by lacerations and contusions of the head and shoulder injuries, which happened ll times

Of the total number of injuries, 126 occurred in the touch football program, including nine of those which were considered major. 68 injuries and three major ones happened while the basketball program was going, and 49 injuries and two major ones occurred during the softball season. * The percentage of injuries was remarkably low considering that there were 30,994 possible injury situations during the year. The number of injury situations was determined by making an actual count of the names appearing on game sheets.

By dividing the number of injury situations into the number of individuals who reported to Olin with injuries sustained in the program, it was found that the total percentage of injury was .0042.

> bad spot. He hates to bid 2 Spades on a 4-card suit, and he can't bid 3 on his Club suit, so he passes.

North can add his points to South's and realize they have at most 22 points, short of game. If he had a good hand, he could carry the auction on, but as it is, he passes. This leaves things up to East.

Knowing his opponents can have 22 or 23 points means that his partner could hold as few as 6 points. And vulnerable, he can hardly do anything but pass.

This is one situation where the weak 2-bid saves the weaker hand, E-W could play a 2-Spade contract and make, for a part-
