Cigar Boxes, Not Cigars as Political Equipment

Down at the University of Kansas last week the junior honorary society used a brand new method of selecting its officers. The old group had gone through a political battle of constant manoeuvering between two parties, each attempting to control the of. fices of the organization.

Then last week the new men came into power. Sick and tired of forever bickering, these men devised the simplest method yet known of selecting officers. They merely stuck the names of all the members into a cigar box and pulled out the names of the men who were to direct the group.

And what, may we ask, is wrong with the idea? Frankly, we can see but one possible flaw. An honorary is supposedly composed of men unusually active on the campus. Some, of necessity, will be more active than others, and will, in fact, be unable to carry an additional load. Therefore, to head a service group would be beyond their capability unless other activities were to suffer.

However, this one possible fault could be overcome by honest withdrawal of anyone who was lucky enough to get a post to which he could not devote the proper time. In other words, there's nothing to keep a man from refusing an office, if he feels he is not in position to fill it.

The major point in favor of the plan is the complete absence of politics in choosing No one group of men is going to get together ahead of time and talk the cigar box into giving up a certain name for president, another for secretary, and so of down the line. Those men whose names will be drawn may be considered lucky, but what of it? In most cases they will be just as good officers as others, if not far better. If an honorary is a true honorary all members should be able to direct its affairs, so the element of chance is not as important as it

On the whole, the plan seems to be a good one. The Kansas group has been beset with members seem to feel that absence of politically elected officers will make for more gues and plots which make Europe such a cooperation that will result in more efficiency within the organization.

There are organizations on this campus which might do well to adopt this plan. It has its merits, and appears lacking in faults. other than that certain men with strong political backing might suffer because they are not lucky on the draw. However, other more capable men without the powerhouse support might get into office and make the organization really worth something around here. It's something really worth consideration.-L. J. D.
